

MMBA222CCT

Business Communication

(بزنس کمیونیکیشن)

MBA
2nd Year Programme
Second Semester

Centre for Distance and Online Education
Maulana Azad National Urdu University
Hyderabad-32, Telangana- India

Copyright © 2025, Maulana Azad National Urdu University, Hyderabad

All right reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronically or mechanically, including photocopying, recording or any information storage or retrieval system, without prior permission in writing form the publisher (registrar@manuu.edu.in)

ISBN : 978-81-685864-7-5
Course : Business Communication
First Edition : May 2026
Copies : 300
Price : 295/- (The price of the book is included in admission fee of distance mode students)

Course Coordinator

Ms. Ismat Fathima

Editorial Board/Editors

Prof. Gulfishan Habeeb
Prof. Mohammed Abdul Sami Siddiqui
Prof. Sharma
Ms. Ismat Fathima
Dr. Yasmeen Sultana

Production

Prof. Nikhath Jahan, Professor (Urdu), CDOE MANUU	Mr. P Habibulla, Assistant Registrar, Purchase & Stores Section, MANUU	Dr. Mohd Akmal Khan, Assistant Professor (C), CDOE MANUU
Mohd Abdul Naseer, Section Officer, CDOE MANUU	Shaik Ismail, UDC, CDOE, MANUU	Syed Faheemuddin, LDC, Purchase & Stores Section, MANUU

On behalf of the Registrar, Published by:

Centre for Distance and Online Education

Maulana Azad National Urdu University

Gachibowli, Hyderabad-500032 (TG), India

Director: dir.dde@manuu.edu.in, Publication: ddepublishation@manuu.edu.in

Phone number: 040-23008314, Website: manuu.edu.in

CRC Prepared by Ibrahim Akram Siddique

Printed at: Mahesh Hardware, Delhi-32

Contents

Message	Vice Chancellor, Maulana Azad National Urdu University	4
Message	Director, Centre for Distance and Online Education	5
Introduction to the Course	Course Coordinator	6

Unit No	Unit Name	Author	Page No.
1	Introduction	Dr. Shaik Kamruddin	7
2	Listening Process	Dr. Shaik Kamruddin	24
3	Feedback	Dr. Shaik Kamruddin	34
4	Presentation Skills	Ms. Ismat Fathima	42
5	Speaking - I	Ms. Ismat Fathima	64
6	Speaking II	Ms. Ismat Fathima	75
7	Negotiation	Ms. Ismat Fathima	91
8	Interviews	Ms. Ismat Fathima	117
9	Group Discussion	Ms. Ismat Fathima	130
10	Written Communication	Dr. Khatib Ur Rub	148
11	Business Correspondence	Dr. Khatib Ur Rub	159
12	Oral Communication	Dr. Khatib Ur Rub	172
	Sample Question Paper		189

Message

Maulana Azad National Urdu University (MANUU) was established in 1998 through an Act of Parliament. It is a Central University accredited with an A+ grade by the National Assessment and Accreditation Council (NAAC).

The University was founded with the following objectives:

1. Promotion of the Urdu language,
2. Making professional and technical education accessible through Urdu,
3. Providing education through both conventional and distance modes, and
4. Giving special emphasis to women's education.

These goals make MANUU unique among central universities, giving it a distinct identity and mission. The National Education Policy (NEP) 2020 also emphasizes education in mother tongues and regional languages — a vision that perfectly aligns with MANUU's founding purpose.

The University's commitment to promoting knowledge through Urdu aims to make modern disciplines and contemporary learning accessible to Urdu-speaking students. For many years, a major challenge was the lack of academic materials in Urdu. Today, MANUU holds a collection of over 350 Urdu textbooks, and this number continues to grow with each semester.

In line with the vision of NEP 2020, the University takes pride in being part of the national mission to provide educational resources in mother and home languages. This initiative ensures that Urdu-speaking learners are not deprived of access to emerging fields of knowledge. The availability of study materials in Urdu has generated a renewed enthusiasm for learning and will contribute significantly to the intellectual growth of the Urdu-speaking community.

To facilitate the teaching-learning process for distance and online learners, MANUU's Centre for Distance and Online Education (CDOE) develops high-quality Self-Learning Materials (SLMs) in Urdu and related disciplines. The University provides these SLMs free of cost to its registered students, and they are also available at a nominal price for those interested in studying Management and Business Administration through Urdu. Additionally, e-SLMs in Urdu, Hindi, English, and Arabic are available for free download on the University's website.

It gives me immense satisfaction that, with the dedicated efforts of the faculty and authors, the publication of MBA (Distance and Online Learning) course books has begun on a large scale. I am confident that these efforts will fulfil the University's mission, serve the educational and professional needs of Urdu learners, and strengthen MANUU's meaningful presence in the national academic landscape.

With best wishes!

Message

In the present era, distance education has emerged as a highly effective and beneficial mode of learning across the world, enabling a vast number of people to pursue higher education. Keeping in view the educational needs of Urdu-speaking communities, Maulana Azad National Urdu University (MANUU) introduced the distance education system right from its inception. The University began its work in 1998 with the Directorate of Distance Education, and from 2004 onwards, regular programmes were launched, followed by the establishment of various departments.

The University Grants Commission (UGC) has played a vital role in strengthening the educational framework in the country. All the programmes offered under the Open and Distance Learning (ODL) mode at the Centre for Distance and Online Education (CDOE) are approved by the UGC–Distance Education Bureau (UGC-DEB). The UGC-DEB emphasizes aligning the curricula of distance and conventional education to maintain parity in academic standards. Being a dual-mode university that offers both distance and conventional education, MANUU introduced the Choice Based Credit System (CBCS) to meet these guidelines. The Self-Learning Materials (SLMs) are being redesigned — comprising six blocks with 24 units for undergraduate programmes and four blocks with 16 units for postgraduate programmes.

The CDOE currently offers 19 programmes, including Undergraduate (UG), Postgraduate (PG), B.Ed., Diploma, and Certificate courses, along with newly introduced skill-based programmes. From July 2025, the Centre launched four-year UG programmes aligned with the National Education Policy (NEP) 2020, covering B.A., B.Sc., and B.Com. (Honours) courses designed according to the National Curriculum Framework (NCF). Additionally, the MBA programme in ODL mode was introduced in 2025–2026.

For academic and administrative support, MANUU has established a wide network of nine Regional Centres (Bengaluru, Bhopal, Darbhanga, Delhi, Kolkata, Mumbai, Patna, Ranchi, and Srinagar), six Sub-Regional Centres (Hyderabad, Lucknow, Jammu, Nuh, Varanasi, and Amravati), and an Extension Centre at Vijayawada. Over 160 Learner Support Centres (LSCs) and 20 Programme Centres function under these centres.

CDOE extensively uses ICT tools and conducts admissions exclusively online. Soft copies of SLMs are available on the CDOE website, along with links to audio and video lectures related to MBA (Distance and Online Learning) courses. Students are also supported through email and WhatsApp groups for timely updates regarding course registration, assignments, counselling, and examinations. In addition to regular counselling, remedial online sessions are organized for students who seek further academic guidance.

The MBA (Distance and Online Learning) Programme aims to make management education through Urdu more accessible, inclusive, and professionally relevant, providing learners from diverse backgrounds with high-quality academic content and practical skills for success in their professional careers.

Prof. Mohd Razaullah Khan
Director, CDOE, MANUU

Introduction to the Course

Business Communication, offered in the Second Semester of the MBA programme, is a vital subject that aims to develop effective communication competencies essential for managerial and professional success. The course emphasizes the importance of clear, structured, and purposeful communication in achieving organizational objectives and maintaining healthy professional relationships. It provides learners with a comprehensive understanding of the principles and processes of communication in business contexts, including verbal, non-verbal, written, and digital communication.

The subject enables students to develop strong listening, speaking, writing, and presentation skills required in modern corporate environments. It covers key areas such as interpersonal communication, group discussions, meetings, negotiations, interviews, report writing, and employment communication. Special attention is given to audience analysis, feedback, emotional intelligence, cross-cultural communication, and ethical considerations in communication. Through practical exercises, case discussions, and real-life business scenarios, students learn how to convey ideas persuasively, manage conflicts, and participate effectively in team-based decision-making.

By the end of the course, students are equipped to communicate confidently and professionally across diverse business situations. The subject not only enhances academic understanding but also prepares future managers to handle workplace challenges, lead teams, and represent organizations effectively. Overall, Business Communication plays a crucial role in shaping competent, responsible, and communication-savvy managers capable of thriving in a dynamic and competitive business environment.

Prof. Mohd Razaullah Khan
Course Coordinator

Unit 1-Introduction

Structure

- 1.0 Introduction
- 1.1 Learning Objectives
- 1.2 Meaning and Definition of Communication
- 1.3 Process of Communication
- 1.4 Objectives of Communication
- 1.5 Types of Communication
- 1.6 Channels of Communication
- 1.7 Barriers to Communication
- 1.8 Models of Communication
- 1.9 7 C's of Communication
- 1.10 Learning Outcomes
- 1.11 Model Exam Questions

1.0 Introduction

In this age of globalization, the survival and progress of a business enterprise depend on the speed and efficiency of communication. Every business organization therefore, sets up an effective communication network for both internal as well as external interactions. Internal communication is necessary for the flow of information from top to bottom and vice versa, which ensures perfect coordination, whereas external communication boosts up procurement and supply activities.

1.1 Learning Objectives

- Learn the fundamentals of communication
- Understand the role of communication
- Learn the process and flow of communication
- Understand the models and channels of communication.

1.2 Meaning and Definitions

Communication is a two-way process wherein the message in the form of ideas, thoughts, feelings or opinions is transmitted between two or more persons with the intent of creating a shared understanding.

Simply put, an act of conveying intended information and understanding from one person to another is called as communication. The term communication is derived from the Latin word “Communis” which means to share. Effective communication is when the message conveyed by the sender is understood by the receiver in exactly the same way as it was intended.

Definitions

According to Keith Davis, 'The process of passing the information and understanding from one person to another.'

Peter Little defines communication as follows: “Communication is the process by which information is transmitted between individuals and / or organizations so that an understanding response results.”

W.H. Newman and C.F. Summer Jr: “Communication is an exchange of facts, ideas, opinions, or emotions by two or more persons.”

1.3 Process of Communication

Communication is a dynamic process that begins with the conceptualizing of ideas by the sender who then transmits the message through a channel to the receiver, who in turn gives the feedback in the form of some message or signal within the given time frame. Thus, there are Seven major elements of communication process:

According to Kottor (1977), communication is "a process consisting of a sender transmitting a message through media to a receiver who responds."

According to Schralm, communication is "an act of establishing contact between a sender and a receiver, with the help of a message: the sender and receiver have some common experience which lends meaning to the message encoded and sent by the sender, and received and decoded by the receiver'.

The above definitions indicate various elements in communication process such as sender, message, and receiver. The communication process model developed by Berlo (1960): clearly shows various elements in communication process. It is also known as "S-M-C-R' model of communication.

1. Sender:

Sender is the person or the party from which a message originates under different scenarios a sender may have different status. Depending on the type of communication. Thus a communication starts from the sender. In the context of a business enterprise, internal communication may originate from the director or the manager or the group leader. It may originate from the lower level of the hierarchy such as co-worker or subordinate who may seek some information, clarification or seeking redressal of some grievance. In the context of external communication, the sender may be a supplier or a vendor seeking the order for the supply of raw materials.

2. Encoding:

Encoding means to convert information into codes. Code is the system of symbol, sign or letter used to represent the secret meaning. According to John Fiske, “coding consists of both signs and rules that determine how and in what context these signs are used and how they can be combined to form more complex messages”. The code and system are inter-related, i.e. type of encoding depends on the medium/channel being used for the transmission of the message.

3. Message:

A message is the information, idea, thought or opinion the sender wants to send. Depending on the status of the sender within or without the business establishment, the nature of the message changes.

4. Channel:

A communication channel is the medium through which communication is sent to its intended receiver. In a business enterprise, utmost care is taken to set up appropriate communication channels so that information flows quickly and correctly within and outside the organization. Using an inappropriate channel for interaction can lead to negative consequences including financial losses. Richer communication channels are used for complex messages to ensure clarity.

5. Receiver:

Receiver is the intended target of the business communication sent by the sender. After the message emerges from the channel, it is received at the receiver's end.

6. Decoding:

Decoding is the opposite of encoding, i.e. the encoded message is reconverted with a readable/understandable message. Communication is more effective if decoding matches clearly with encoding. For example, a business enterprise gives a visual advertisement of its product on TV. There are some actions in the advertisement intended to give some specific impressions on the viewer (Receiver). The advertisement will be successful only if the viewer is able to understand (decode) the message intended to give through these actions. Sometimes, the recipient may receive in different way from what the encoder was trying to communicate. This is called distortion and it occurs when there is lack of equivalence between the two sides.

7. Feedback:

After the receiver has received the message, he/she sends the response. The analysis of the response in terms of the information sought by the sender is called feedback. For example, the management/ sender sends a message to the marketing in charge (Receiver) seeking about the performance of their new product in the market. The marketing officer after collecting sales data of their product and also of the other competitor's products, prepares a report and makes some suggestions (e.g. decreasing the price or giving some offer, such as buy one get two, etc.) and sends to the management (response).

Thus, the response or reaction of the receiver sent to the sender is the feedback of the whole process. Feedback is extremely important for making business communication effective. The progress of the business depends on useful feedback.

1.4 Objectives of Communication

The objectives of business communication are manifold, including:

- Facilitating decision-making: Effective communication helps employees, managers and other stakeholders share information and make informed decisions.
- Building and maintaining relationships: Another key point is good communication. It helps to build and maintain positive relationships with customers, suppliers and other stakeholders.
- Achieving organizational goals: Effective communication is essential for coordinating activities and achieving common goals within an organization.
- Promote understanding: Business communication helps to promote understanding and clarity among employees and stakeholders, reducing confusion and misunderstandings.

1.5 Types of Communication

Communication can be categorized into different types based on how the message is transmitted. The four main types of communication are:

1. Verbal Communication

Verbal communication involves the use of spoken or written words to convey messages. It is one of the most common forms of communication used in everyday life.

a. Oral Communication

This involves spoken words and is used in face-to-face conversations, phone calls, speeches, meetings, and presentations.

Examples:

- Conversations between friends, family, or colleagues
- Business meetings and interviews
- Public speaking and speeches
- Phone calls and video conferences

Advantages:

- Quick and immediate feedback
- Personal and engaging
- Allows for tone and emotions to be expressed

Disadvantages:

- Can be misunderstood if tone or pronunciation is unclear

- Requires active listening to avoid misinterpretation

b. Written Communication

This involves written words used to communicate a message. It can be formal or informal and is essential in professional settings.

Examples:

- Emails and text messages
- Letters and memos
- Reports, articles, and documentation
- Social media posts and blogs

Advantages:

- Provides a record of communication
- Can be edited and refined before sending
- Useful for long-distance communication

Disadvantages:

- Lacks tone and emotional cues, which may lead to misinterpretation
- Can be time-consuming

2. Non-Verbal Communication

Non-verbal communication involves sending messages without words, using body language, facial expressions, gestures, and tone of voice. It plays a crucial role in reinforcing verbal messages.

Types of Non-Verbal Communication:

- Facial Expressions – Smiling, frowning, raising eyebrows, etc.
- Body Language – Posture, stance, and movements that express feelings.
- Gestures – Hand signals like waving, pointing, or thumbs-up.
- Eye Contact – Indicates attention, confidence, or discomfort.
- Tone of Voice – The way words are spoken, including pitch, volume, and emphasis.
- Personal Space (Proxemics) – The distance between people during interactions.
- Touch (Haptics) – Handshakes, hugs, or pats on the back.

Examples:

- Nodding to show agreement
- Crossed arms indicating defensiveness

- Eye contact showing attentiveness or interest

Advantages:

- Enhances verbal communication
- Helps convey emotions effectively
- Useful in situations where words are not enough

Disadvantages:

- Can be misinterpreted based on cultural differences
- Lacks clarity without verbal confirmation

3. Visual Communication

Visual communication involves using images, charts, graphs, diagrams, videos, and other visual elements to convey messages.

Examples:

- Infographics and charts used in presentations
- Road signs and traffic signals
- Advertisements and branding logos
- Educational videos and animations

Advantages:

- Makes complex information easy to understand
- Attracts attention and enhances retention
- Universally understood (e.g., traffic signs)

Disadvantages:

- Can be misinterpreted if not designed well
- May require additional explanation in some cases

4. Digital Communication

With advancements in technology, digital communication has become a crucial form of interaction. It involves using electronic media to send messages.

Examples:

- Emails and instant messaging (WhatsApp, Messenger)
- Social media (Facebook, Instagram, Twitter)
- Video conferencing (Zoom, Google Meet)
- Online forums and blogs

Advantages:

- Fast and efficient, allowing instant global communication
- Provides records of conversations
- Allows multimedia (text, images, videos)

Disadvantages:

- Can lack personal touch and emotional depth
- Risk of misinterpretation due to lack of tone and non-verbal cues
- Security and privacy concerns

1.6 Channels of Communication

Communication channels are the methods or mediums used to exchange information between individuals or groups. They act as conduits through which messages travel, whether verbal, written, non-verbal, or digital. Each channel has unique characteristics that make it suitable for different types of communication, depending on the context and requirements of the message.

Importance of Channels of Communication

Choosing the right communication channel is vital for ensuring the message is delivered effectively and understood. The appropriate channel can enhance clarity, facilitate better feedback, and align with the audience's preferences. Conversely, selecting the wrong channel can lead to miscommunication, decreased efficiency, and frustration.

Different Channels of Communication Verbal Communication:

- Face-to-Face: This channel allows for direct interaction and immediate feedback. It benefits nuanced discussions, building relationships, and resolving complex issues. However, it may not always be practical for geographically dispersed teams.
- Telephone: Telephone communication provides a personal touch and enables real-time conversation. It is useful for urgent matters and situations where immediate interaction is required. However, it lacks visual cues and can lead to misunderstandings if not supplemented with other channels.
- Video Conferencing: With the rise of remote work, video conferencing has become increasingly important. It combines visual and auditory elements, making it effective for virtual meetings and presentations. Yet, it requires a stable internet connection and can be challenging to manage in large groups.

Written Communication:

- Emails: Emails are widely used for formal communication and documentation. They are ideal for detailed information, official notifications, and records. But, emails can sometimes lead to misinterpretation due to the need for immediate feedback and non-verbal cues.
- Reports and Memos: These are formal documents used to convey detailed information and updates. They provide a permanent record of communication and are crucial for organisational documentation. However, they may not always be engaging and can be time-consuming to produce.
- Instant Messaging: Instant messaging offers quick and informal communication, suitable for short updates and casual interactions. It is convenient for fast-paced environments but can lead to information overload if not managed properly.

Non-Verbal Communication:

- Body Language: Non-verbal cues such as gestures, facial expressions, and posture play a significant role in communication. They can reinforce verbal messages or convey emotions and attitudes, but interpreting them accurately can be subjective.
- Visual Aids: Charts, graphs, and images can enhance understanding and retention of information. They are particularly useful in presentations and educational contexts. However, they must be used appropriately to avoid overwhelming the audience.

Digital Communication:

- Social Media: Social media platforms facilitate both personal and professional communication. They allow for broad outreach and engagement with diverse audiences but can also pose challenges related to privacy and information accuracy.
- Blogs and Websites: These are effective for sharing detailed information, updates, and engaging with a wider audience. They serve as valuable resources for content marketing and knowledge dissemination but require regular maintenance and content creation.
- Online Forums and Communities: These platforms provide spaces for knowledge sharing, discussions, and support. They are valuable for connecting with experts and peers but can be time-consuming and require moderation to ensure quality interactions.

Choosing the Right Communication Channel

- Audience: Consider the preferences and needs of the message's recipients. Different audiences may respond better to specific channels based on their expectations and habits.

- Message Complexity: Complex or detailed messages may be better suited for written communication, while simpler messages can be effectively conveyed through verbal or digital channels.
- Urgency: For urgent matters, channels that offer immediate interaction, such as telephone or instant messaging, are more appropriate.
- Formality: The level of formality required will influence the choice of channel. Formal communications are best suited for emails and reports, while informal interactions may be handled through instant messaging or face-to-face conversations.
- Feedback: If immediate feedback is necessary, choose channels that facilitate real-time interaction, such as video conferencing or telephone.

1.7 Barriers to Communication

The term barrier means hurdle, hindrance or obstacle. Thus, barriers to communication imply hurdles or obstacles on the way of transmission of message from the sender to the receiver. In practice, there exist several barriers in communication which render it ineffective. They generate confusion, conflict and misunderstanding in the organization by creating bottlenecks, delays and distortions of information.

A. Physical Barriers

The most evident impediments to successful communication, and they usually easily removed in concept at least, such as noise, closed doors, malfunctioning communication equipment, closed cabins, and so on.

B. Language Barrier

Language is the most often used medium of communication; it is one of the most significant hurdles to efficient communication. Each major region has its own language, and dialects between regions can differ by a few kilometres, and even a thick dialect can make communication difficult. Diverse employees will have different linguistic skills even in the same workplace, and as a result, communication channels that transcend the corporation will be affected. Even when communicating in the same language, a message's terminology can be a barrier if it is not fully understood by the receiver, who is unfamiliar with the terminology.

C. Attitude Barriers

Communication is also hampered by prejudice, distrust, emotional aggression, or discrimination based on gender, ethnicity, or religion. They arise as a result of a lack of drive or a refusal to adapt. Effective listening, criticism, problem-solving, and being open to change can all help you break down communication barriers.

D. Perception Barriers

Different people view the same things in different ways, which is something we must keep in mind when communicating. Effective communication requires an understanding of the audience's perception levels, and all messages or communications must be simple and straightforward. There should be no place for a diverse set of interpretations.

E. Hierarchical Barriers

Organizational hierarchy can be a difficult communication barrier resulting in a lack of transparency or a communication barrier. Establishing a transparent discussion with the appropriate persons is the solution.

F. Psychological Barriers of communication

A variety of mental and psychological issues can obstruct effective communication, such as stage fright, speech disorders, phobias, depression, and so on. Anger, fear, jealousy, insecurity, shyness, and close-mindedness are all psychological barriers that can obstruct communication. All of these conditions are difficult to manage at times and will obstruct communication.

G. Cultural Barriers

As the world becomes more globalized, any major office may contain people from many corners of the globe, and different cultures have varied interpretations of some core societal norms. From one culture to the next, clothing, religion (or lack thereof), food, drinks, pets, and general behaviour will differ dramatically.

1.8 Models of Communication

Communication models help us understand how information is transmitted, received, and interpreted between individuals or groups. These models illustrate the process of communication, highlighting the key elements involved.

There are three main types of communication models:

1. Linear Model (One-way communication)
2. Interactive Model (Two-way communication with feedback)
3. Transactional Model (Simultaneous exchange of messages)

Elements of the Linear Model:

- Sender – The person or entity sending the message.
- Message – The information being communicated.
- Channel – The medium used (e.g., speech, writing, television).
- Receiver – The person who receives and decodes the message.
- Noise – Any interference that distorts the message (e.g., background noise, poor signal).

Example:

A radio announcer delivers news to listeners. The listeners receive the message, but they cannot immediately respond to the announcer.

Limitations of the Linear Model:

- No feedback is involved.
- The receiver plays a passive role.
- It does not account for misunderstandings or noise affecting the message.

Notable Linear Models:

- Shannon-Weaver Model (1949) – Introduced the concept of "noise" that can distort communication.
- Lasswell's Model (1948) – Focuses on "Who says what, in which channel, to whom, with what effect?"

Interactive Model of Communication

The Interactive Model improves upon the Linear Model by including feedback, making communication a two-way process. It also acknowledges the role of the environment (context) in communication.

Elements of the Interactive Model:

- Sender – The person who initiates the communication.
- Message – The content being shared.
- Channel – The medium used to convey the message.
- Receiver – The person who receives and interprets the message.
- Feedback – The receiver's response to the sender's message.
- Context – The situation or environment in which communication occurs.

Example:

A teacher gives a lecture (message) to students. The students respond by asking questions (feedback), making it an interactive process.

Limitations of the Interactive Model:

- Feedback is not simultaneous; there may be delays.
- It assumes communication occurs in turns rather than continuously.

Notable Interactive Models:

1. Schramm's Model (1954) – Introduced the concept of a "field of experience," where shared background knowledge improves communication.
2. Osgood-Schramm Model – Highlights that both participants are both senders and receivers.
3. Transactional Model of Communication: The Transactional Model describes communication as a dynamic, continuous, and simultaneous process where both participants act as senders and receivers.

Elements of the Transactional Model:

- Communicators – Both participants send and receive messages at the same time.
- Message – The content exchanged between communicators.
- Channel – The medium used for communication.
- Noise – Interference that may affect communication.
- Feedback – Responses given during the conversation.
- Context – The situation and background of communication.

Example:

Two friends are having a face-to-face conversation. Both are speaking, listening, reacting with facial expressions, and using body language at the same time.

Advantages of the Transactional Model:

- Recognizes that communication is continuous.
- Acknowledges non-verbal cues and emotions.
- Considers context, noise, and feedback.

Limitations of the Transactional Model:

- Can be complex due to multiple factors influencing communication.
- Difficult to analyze when many messages overlap.

Notable Transactional Models:

1. Barnlund's Model (1970) – Describes communication as a continuous and interactive exchange.

Comparison of the Communication Models

Feature	Linear Model	Interactive Model	Transactional Model
Direction	One-way	Two-way	Simultaneous
Feedback	Not included	Included	Continuous
Noise Considered?	Yes	Yes	Yes
Example	TV Broadcast	Email Conversation	Face-to-Face Talk

Each communication model provides a unique way to understand how messages are shared and interpreted.

1.9 7 C's of Communication

In the business world, effective communication is the key to success. An effective communication is applicable to both oral as well as written communication. It is therefore very important to understand 7C's of communication which help in conveying important messages effectively in turn increasing employee engagement and productivity.

The 7C's of communication are:

1. Clarity
2. Correctness
3. Conciseness
4. Courtesy
5. Concreteness
6. Consideration
7. Completeness

1. Clarity:

This means that a specific message has been sent instead of trying to send too many messages at one particular time. This involves use of simple and precise services. The following are the features of clarity.

- Clear understanding
- Clarity of thoughts and ideas
- Use of simple, appropriate and precise words

2. Correctness:

Use of correct language, grammar, data etc. is very important to communicate the message clearly. The features of correctness are:

- Timely, exact and correct message
- Confidence Booster
- Greater impact on the audience

3. Conciseness:

This means communicating using minimum but appropriate words. It has the following features:

- Time saving
- Avoids excessive usage of unnecessary words
- Short and limited
- Appealing and comprehensible
- Non- repeatable

4. Courtesy:

This is one of the important C's of communication as it shows the respect, politeness, judicious behaviour to the other party in turn creating goodwill. It has the following features:

- Consideration of the feelings of the audience
- Positive and focused
- Unbiased

5. Concreteness:

As the term suggests, it is specific, meaningful and clear and avoids ambiguity and double- meaning. This has the following features:

- Supports facts and figures
- Clear and precise
- Avoids misinterpretation

6. Consideration:

This implies that the audience is taken into consideration in terms of his/her view points, culture, mind-set, values etc. The features of this are:

- Stresses on 'you' approach
- Empathetic
- Optimistic

7. Completeness:

The last C of communication is completeness. As the term suggests it means that any communication be it personal or professional should be complete. It should deliver all the facts and information required to send the message to the receiver. It has the following features:

- Builds reputation of the organisation
- Cost saving
- Removes the barriers of vague information
- Helps in better decision-making.

1.10 Learning Outcomes

After studying this unit, learners will be able to understand the concept, meaning, and scope of business communication and its relevance in modern organizations. They will gain knowledge of the communication process and its essential elements and understand the objectives and importance of communication in achieving organizational goals. Learners will be able to identify different types and channels of communication, analyze barriers to effective communication, and apply suitable methods to overcome them. They will also understand various communication models and apply the principles of the 7 C's of communication to improve effectiveness in business interactions.

1.11 Model Exam Questions:

Objective Answer Type Questions

1. What is the exchange of information called?
2. What is the response given by the receiver in communication called?
3. What type of communication uses gestures and facial expressions?
4. What is the biggest barrier to effective communication?
5. What type of communication takes place through emails and letters?

Short Answers Type Questions

1. Define communication and explain its key components.
2. Describe the different types of communication with examples.
3. Explain the process of communication with a suitable diagram.
4. Discuss the importance of effective communication in daily life.
5. What are the major barriers to communication? How can they be overcome?

Long Answers Type Questions

1. How does nonverbal communication impact interpersonal interactions? Provide examples.
2. Discuss the role of feedback in the communication process.
3. Explain the significance of listening skills in communication.
4. What is the difference between formal and informal communication? Give examples.
5. How does communication play a crucial role in workplace productivity?

Unit 2-Listening Process

Structure

- 2.0 Introduction
- 2.1 Learning Objectives
- 2.2 Meaning and Definitions
- 2.3 Importance of Listening
- 2.4 Difference between Hearing and Listening
- 2.5 Listening Process
- 2.6 Types of Listening
- 2.7 Determinants of Good Listening
- 2.8 Barriers to Listening
- 2.9 Traits of a Good Listener
- 2.10 Improving Listening Competence
- 2.11 Learning Outcomes
- 2.12 Model Exam Questions

2.0 Introduction

Listening is the ability to accurately receive and interpret messages in the communication process. Listening is key to all effective communication. Without the ability to listen effectively messages are easily misunderstood – communication breaks down and the sender of the message can easily become frustrated or irritated.

2.1 Learning Objectives

By understanding and applying effective listening skills, individuals can achieve several key learning outcomes that enhance communication, comprehension, and relationships. Below are some of the important learning outcomes:

- Improved Comprehension
- Effective Communication Skills
- Stronger Interpersonal Relationships
- Active Engagement in Discussions

2.2 Meaning and Definitions:

Meaning:

Listening is a fundamental communication skill that involves actively receiving, processing, and understanding spoken or non-verbal messages. Unlike hearing, which is simply the physiological ability to perceive sound, listening requires conscious effort, attention, and interpretation.

Definitions :

Listening can be defined as the process of actively making sense of, interpreting, and responding to spoken or non-verbal messages. It is an intentional act that involves focusing on what is being communicated, understanding its meaning, and providing appropriate feedback.

- K.Devis : “ Listening is a conscious positive act, requiring will power. It is not a simple, passive exposure to sound.”
- Rogers: “Listening reflects a whole orientation to life and people.”
- Leland Brown: “Listening is an activity that can be turned on and off consciously and unconsciously. It starts with the receiver’s becoming aware that they should listen and become attentive to what is being said.”
- M.V. Rodrigues: “Listening is a process or receiving, interpreting and reacting the messages received from the communication sender.”

2.3 Importance of Listening

Importance

Listening is so important that many top employers provide listening skills training for their employees. This is not surprising when you consider that good listening skills can lead to better customer satisfaction, greater productivity with fewer mistakes, increased sharing of information that in turn can lead to more creative and innovative work. Many successful leaders and entrepreneurs credit their success to effective listening skills. Effective listening is a skill that underpins all positive human relationships, spend some time thinking about and developing your listening skills – they are the building blocks of success.

- Enhances communication and relationships.
- Improves problem-solving and decision-making.
- Strengthens professional and personal interactions.
- Helps in learning and knowledge retention.

2.4 Difference between Hearing and Listening

Often most people get confused with picking up sound vibrations and making a sense of meaning out of what they hear. Hearing is a physical process, while listening is a mental process.

Listening skills require the use of ears, brain, eyes to understand non-variable cues, with such additional insights like perception, attitudes, participation etc. Listening is with the mind and hearing is with the ears.

2.5 Listening Process

Listening is an active process that requires attention, interpretation, and response. Effective listening enhances understanding, strengthens relationships, and improves problem-solving. The listening process can be broken down into five key stages:

Receiving

This is the first step, where the listener hears the speaker's words and sounds. It requires focus and the ability to filter out distractions to capture the intended message.

Understanding

Once the message is received, the listener interprets its meaning. This involves grasping the speaker's words, tone, and emotions. Background knowledge, experience, and context play a role in comprehension.

Remembering

Retaining the information shared is crucial for effective communication. Taking notes, summarizing, or mentally organizing the key points helps in better recall and application.

Evaluating

At this stage, the listener assesses the message's credibility, logic, and significance. This helps in distinguishing facts from opinions and forming a response.

Responding

Communication is a two-way process, and responding shows that the listener has understood the message. Responses can be verbal (asking questions, providing feedback) or non-verbal (nodding, maintaining eye contact).

2.6 Types of Listening

1. Active Listening: Active listening is a skill that can be acquired and developed with practice. Active listening involves listening with all senses. As well as giving full attention to the speaker, it is important that the 'active listener' is also 'seen' to be listening - otherwise the speaker may conclude that what they are talking about is uninteresting to the listener.

Interest can be conveyed to the speaker by using both verbal and non-verbal messages such as maintaining eye contact, nodding your head and smiling, agreeing by saying 'Yes' or simply 'Mmm hmm' to encourage them to continue. By providing this 'feedback' the person speaking will usually feel more at ease and therefore communicate more easily, openly and honestly.

2. Passive Listening: Passive Listening occurs when a listener does not verbally respond to the speaker. The listener may deliberately or unintentionally send non-verbal messages through eye contact, smiles, yawns or nods. Sometimes passive listening is appropriate. If the speaker wants to vent frustration or express an opinion he may listen passively. Passive listening is mechanical and effortless. It does not require any special-effort. You hear what your teacher says and you might be able to tell the difference between major and minor points of the lecture, but that is about it. Lack of enthusiasm and a "careless" attitude during class characterize a studentship is a passive listener.
3. Marginal Listening: A listener has the capacity four times faster than someone can talk. So the listener can use the extra time available to think about other matters than the subject matter given by the speaker. This is known as marginal listening.
4. Evaluating Listening: A listener while listening to a message, spares his time and thinks to judge and evaluate what is said by the speaker, and sometimes, form rebuttals to it. Evaluating of listening does not permit the submission of two opposing ideas.
5. Projective Listening: It is more commonly used in committee meetings and any other types of group communication. It is a process to observe and understand what is said and assimilate the viewpoint of the speaker. Listening to this type is more useful in solving complex problems and in using participative leadership tools.
6. Deliberate listening: A listening is said to be deliberate when it is intended to comprehend the content of the message and to understand the feeling and context in which the communication is taking place.

7. Listening by Observation: It is systematic and deliberate study through the eyes of spontaneous occurrence of feelings and actions of the speaker while talking. The aim of observational listening is to draw meanings from non-verbal cues. The listener observes carefully the facial expressions of the speaker, gestures, body language, nod, smile, and other mannerisms. On observation, one may perceive stimuli as they are exhibited by the speaker.
8. Empathetic Listening: Understanding the emotions and feelings behind the message.
9. Selective Listening: Focusing only on certain parts of the message, sometimes leading to misunderstanding.

2.7 Determinants of Good Listening

1. Understanding the speaker's feeling: Better to understand the feelings of the speaker expressing his impulses. It is also equally necessary to understand his intellectual account. Effective listening demand careful attention because most of the people have difficulty in talking clearly about their feelings.
2. Time for discussion: It is good principle to allow time for discussion to continue without interruption. It is also advisable to separate the conversation from mere official communication. In other words, do not make the conversation any more authoritative.
3. Common cliches: Try to listen for what is not said - evasions for pertinent or perhaps too-ready agreement with common cliches. The omission of this type may be a clue to gather some more facts from the person.
4. Avoid expressing views: Try to limit the expression of views because these may encourage or repress what the other person says.
5. Less explanation: In effective communication, better results can be achieved by giving less emphasis to explaining and more emphasis to listening.
6. Rapport: It is good principle to establish good rapport with the sender.

2.8 Barriers to Listening

There are many things that get in the way of listening and you should be aware of these barriers, many of which are bad habits, in order to become a more effective listener. Barriers and bad habits to effective listening can include:

- Excessive Talking

Good conversational skills are an asset, and a person with this skill is more likely to achieve professional success. However, talking more than is necessary is a barrier to effective communication. People hesitate to interact with a person who talks excessively without listening to them. They may also get bored, and excessive talking may be perceived as aggression.

- Prejudice

Prejudice is a preconceived opinion of feeling, which is usually irrational. Prejudice is very dangerous and has the potential to bring animosity into the team and to break team spirit. The reason for a prejudice may be the speaker's race, religion, age or appearance. A prejudiced person will not make any effort to listen and understand. The four main types of distractions are physical, mental, auditory and visual. It is fine to have personal beliefs and values, but an excessive attachment to them will have a negative impact on your ability to communicate effectively with others. Learn to appreciate the fact that each and every person has his or her own set of beliefs and values.

- Misunderstanding

Inability to hear correctly is one of the many reasons for misunderstanding of what the speaker is trying to communicate. This inability to hear is often the result of prejudice. To avoid misunderstanding, always clarify with the speaker to ensure that you have understood correctly.

- Interrupting

Interrupting a conversation with improper body language or inappropriate words will have a negative impact in effective communication.

- Bringing in Emotions

Emotions erect barriers to effective communication. A listener's senses are not likely to be functioning at their optimum level when he or she is angry. Likewise, it is not possible to understand or appreciate what the speaker is saying if the listener is excessively sad.

- Noise

Noise is “any unwanted sound.” It is a great impediment to clear communication. It is impossible to listen in a noisy environment. It becomes a frustrating experience for both the speaker and the listener.

- Previous Experiences

We are all influenced by previous experiences in life. We respond to people based on personal appearances, how initial introductions or welcomes were received and/or previous interpersonal encounters. If we stereotype a person we become less objective and therefore less likely to listen effectively.

- Having a Closed Mind

We all have ideals and values that we believe to be correct and it can be difficult to listen to the views of others that contradict our own opinions. The key to effective listening and interpersonal skills more generally is the ability to have a truly open mind - to understand why others think about things differently to you and use this information to gain a better understanding of the speaker

2.9 Traits of a Good Listener

The following attributes of good listening are suggestive of the skills needed.

Concentration:

Good listening is normally hard work. At every moment we are receiving literally millions of sensory messages. Our ears are hearing the buzzing of the computer fan, street sounds, music in the background and dozens of other sounds and thousands more signals are knocking at the doors of our senses. We have to repress almost all of these and concentrate on the verbal sounds (and visual clues) from one source - the speaker. And this concentration, if something that most of us have not been thoroughly trained in how to do. You should focus your attention on the words, ideas and feeling related to the subject. Concentrate on the main ideas or points. Don't let examples or fringe comments detract you. All of this takes a conscious effort.

Attention:

Attention may be defined as the visual portion of concentration on the speaker. Through eye contact and other body language, we communicate to the speaker that we are paying close attention to his/her messages. All the time we are reading the verbal and nonverbal cues from the speaker, the speaker is reading ours. What messages are we sending out? If we lean forward a little and focus our eyes on the person, the message is we are paying close attention.

Eye contact:

Good eye contact is essential for several reasons: First, by maintaining eye contact, some of the competing visual inputs are eliminated. You are not as likely to be distracted from the person talking to you. Second, most of us have learned to read lips, often unconsciously, and the lip reading helps us to understand verbal messages. Third, much of many messages are in non-verbal form and by watching the eyes and face of a person we pick up clues as to the content. A squinting of the eyes may indicate close attention. A slight nod indicates understanding or agreement. Most English language messages can have several meanings depending upon voice inflection, voice modulation, facial expression, etc. Finally, our eye contact with the speaker is feedback concerning the message.

Receptive Body Language:

Certain body postures and movements are culturally interpreted with specific meanings. The crossing of arms and legs is perceived to mean a closing of the mind and attention. The nodding of the head vertically is interpreted as agreement or assent. If seated, the leaning forward with the upper body communicates attention. Standing or seated, the maintenance of an appropriate distance is important. Too close and we appear to be pushy or aggressive and too far and we are seen as cold.

Objective:

We should be open to the message the other person is sending. It is very difficult to be completely open because each of us is strongly biased by the weight of our past experiences. We give meaning to the messages based upon what we have been taught the words and symbols mean by our parents, our peers and our teachers. Talk to someone from a different culture and watch how they give meaning to words. Or another listening challenge is to listen open and objectively to a person with very different political or religious beliefs.

Relatively a few people can listen, understand and appreciate such messages which are very different from their own.

Questioning/Clarifying:

Questions can serve the same purpose as restating the message. If you are unclear about the intent of the message, ask for more information after allowing sufficient time for explanations. Don't ask questions that will hurt, embarrass or show up the other person.

Only part of the responsibility is with the speaker. You have an important and active role to play also. If the message does not get through, two people have failed-the speaker and you as an active listener.

Leave the Channel Open. A good listener always leaves open the possibility of additional messages. A brief question or a nod will often encourage additional communication.

2.10 Improving Listening Competence

Listening Competence

Listening competence refers to the ability to actively, accurately, and effectively process, understand, and respond to spoken and non-verbal messages. It is a crucial skill in communication that enhances understanding, relationships, and decision-making in both personal and professional settings.

Key Components of Listening Competence

1. Attentiveness

- Focusing fully on the speaker without distractions.
- Avoiding interruptions and multitasking while listening.

2. Understanding and Interpretation

- Comprehending the message, including words, tone, and emotions.
- Recognizing non-verbal cues such as gestures, facial expressions, and body language.

3. Critical Thinking and Evaluation

- Analyzing the credibility and logic of the message.
- Differentiating between facts, opinions, and biases.

4. Effective Response and Feedback

- Providing verbal and non-verbal feedback to show engagement.
- Asking relevant questions and summarizing key points for clarity.

5. Retention and Recall

- Remembering important details from conversations.
- Applying information effectively in future interactions.

2.11 Learning Outcomes

After completing this unit, learners will be able to understand the meaning and importance of listening in the communication process and distinguish clearly between hearing and listening. They will gain knowledge of the stages involved in the listening process and understand different types of listening used in organizational communication. Learners will be able to identify determinants of good listening, recognize barriers to effective listening, and develop the traits of a good listener. The unit will also enhance learners' listening competence for better interpersonal relationships and managerial effectiveness.

2.12 Model Exam Questions

Objective Answer Type Questions

1. What is hearing?

2. Name the 5 components of the listening process.
3. Define emphatic listening.
4. What is listening competence?
5. How does effective listening improves communication skill?

Short Answers Type Questions

1. Differentiate between listening and hearing.
2. Explain the importance of Active Listening.
3. Discuss the importance of listening in communication.

Long Answers Type Questions

1. Discuss various types of listening with suitable examples in the organizational context.
2. Describe the determinants of listening.
3. Explain the process of listening

Unit 3-Feedback

Structure

- 3.0 Introduction
- 3.1 Objectives
- 3.2 Meaning and Definition of Feedback
- 3.3 Feedback in Business Communication
- 3.4 Importance of Feedback
- 3.5 Reasons Why Feedback is Essential in Communication
- 3.6 Characteristics of Effective Feedback
- 3.7 Types of Feedback
- 3.8 Principles of Feedback
- 3.9 Learning Outcomes
- 3.10 Model Exam Questions

3.0 Introduction

Feedback in communication is the response, reaction, or information given by the recipient of a message to the sender. It is the process of letting someone know which areas they need to improve.

3.1 Learning Objectives:

1. Learn the importance of feedback in business communication.
2. Understand the reasons for feedback in Communication.
3. Learn about the effective characteristics of feedback.
4. Learn various types of feedback and its application in different contexts.

3.2 Meaning and Definition:

Definition: Feedback is the response of the receiver of the communication, to the message. It plays a vital role as it makes communication effective. Also, without proper feedback, communication is considered incomplete. With feedback, a person can express his/her feelings and perceptions to another individual regarding their behaviour and work style.

In the process of communication, the receiver not only absorbs the message passively but also provides a response to it. This is what we call feedback. More importantly, it helps the sender to understand how effective the message was.

Suppose with the feedback of the receiver, the sender realizes that the recipients misinterpreted the message, then the sender can make efforts to refine the message and send it again.

Next, the response can be verbal or non-verbal. It is the last step of communication. Further, it tends to develop an understanding between the parties concerned. This helps them in reaching a decision, which is beneficial to both parties.

Communication refers to the interchange of information or ideas between sender and recipient. In addition, communication is said to be effective only when the recipient interprets the message in the way in which the sender has intended.

But, how do a sender will know what the recipient has interpreted from the message? In this way, feedback acts as a tool that enables the sender to know whether the recipient has understood the message in the same terms.

For the recipient, it is essential that he gets the message correctly and revert to the source about the subject matter. The response should be about what they have understood. Such a response from the recipient is feedback.

Providing proper feedback is considered an art that improves the sender's relationships with others. It ensures a two-way process.

3.3 Feedback in Communication:

Feedback is a crucial element of business communication that ensures messages are understood, promotes continuous improvement, and fosters effective collaboration. It involves the process of responding to information, messages, or actions in a way that enhances understanding and performance.

3.4 Importance of Feedback

Importance of Feedback in Business Communication

- Enhances Clarity – Ensures that the intended message is understood correctly.
- Improves Performance – Helps individuals and teams refine their work.
- Builds Strong Relationships – Encourages open communication and trust among colleagues.
- Promotes Continuous Learning – Supports professional development and innovation.
- Communication is of no use without feedback.
- It facilitates the evaluation of the effectiveness of the message.
- Makes communication purposeful
- Keeps up the communication process
- The basis for checking the effectiveness of the communication.
- Maintains an open communication climate.

The basis for future planning as it helps in deciding the next step that a person can take to achieve the set goal.

3.5 Reasons why feedback is essential in Communication

Confirmation of Understanding:

In effective communication, people need to know that their message has been received and comprehended as intended. Without feedback, it is possible that the sender won't be aware that their communication has been misunderstood, which might cause confusion and blunders.

Improves communication:

Feedback helps increase communication by informing the sender of what went well and what didn't.

Develops Trust:

Feedback delivered positively and encouragingly can aid in developing trust between the sender and recipient. Over time, this may result in closer ties and improved communication.

Encourages positive behavior:

Providing constructive feedback can motivate the recipient to continue engaging in positive behaviors.

Identifies areas for improvement:

Negative feedback can be used to identify areas for improvement. However, when given constructively and with the intention of helping the recipient learn and grow, this can lead to considerable changes in the caliber of communication.

Feedback is crucial in two-way communication to ensure both sides are on the same page and can prevent misunderstandings or confusion. It also strengthens the bonds of trust and rapport between the sender and the recipient.

3.6 Characteristics of Effective Feedback

Specificity:

Effective feedback is always specific and not general. It is designed to provide recipients with specific information so that they know what must be done to correct the situation. Ineffective feedback is general and leaves the questions in the recipient's mind.

- Validity: Feedback must be valid and reliable.
- Focuses on behaviour: We must always refer to the actions and behaviour of the person instead of what type of person we perceive he/she could be.
- Considers the needs of the feedback receiver: Feedback can prove destructive when it serves personal needs only and does not recognize the needs of the person who receives it. Feedback should be provided with an intention to help and not to hurt others.
- Readiness: Employees must be ready to receive feedback. When feedback is imposed or forced upon employees, it is much less effective.
- Timeliness: Immediate feedback on any matter is the most useful one. There are many possible emotional reactions involved in the reception and use of feedback.
- Usefulness: Effective feedback is information that an employee can use to improve performance. It serves no purpose to tolerate employees for their lack of skills if they do not have the ability or training to perform properly. Thus, the guideline is that, if it is not something the employee can correct, it is worth mentioning.

The characteristics of feedback for effective and ineffective interpersonal communication is:

Effective Feedback	Ineffective Feedback
Intended to help the employee	Intended to belittle the employee
Specific	General

Descriptive	Evaluative
Useful	Not useful as intended
Employee Readiness for feedback	Makes an employee defensive
Clear	Not Understandable
Valid	Inaccurate
Timely	Untimely

3.7 Types of Feedback:

Types of feedback

There are several types of feedback in communication, each serving a specific purpose in the communication process. Here are some of the most common types of feedback:

Formal feedback: Many companies adopt this type of feedback for evaluating productivity in a given time. Its structure is simple and objective, giving both the managers and employees a chance to talk about what they can improve in their work and communication strategy.

Evaluative feedback: It is a way to describe an individual's behavior and has beneficial results only when it is positive. This type of feedback is not always recommended because it can often be perceived as too personal.

Prescriptive feedback: It is a form of advice in which the recipient tells the sender how to correct their way of working. Although this type of feedback can be helpful in the early stages, such as training or onboarding, it can also be a way to avoid giving constructive feedback on the individual's work.

Descriptive feedback: As the name implies, this type of feedback is used to describe the effects of an individual's action, which leads to the presentation of a relevant opinion. Descriptive feedback is considered the best form of evaluation in the workplace and other fields, such as education and science. To be motivated, especially when working for someone else, team members need to feel appreciated, even when improvements need to be made.

Formative Feedback: It is likely to modify the thinking or behaviour of the people for the purpose of learning.

Summative Feedback: It analyses in what way people accomplish a task or attain results for the purpose of grading.

Positive Feedback: An affirmative statement on a person's past behaviour so as to encourage such behaviour.

Negative Feedback: This is a corrective statement on a person's previous behaviour so as to stop the repetition of such behaviour.

Positive Feed forward: An affirmative statement on a person's future behaviour, so that person could work and improve his performance in future.

Negative Feed forward: A corrective statement on a person's future behaviour so that the person could stop repeating a certain behaviour in future.

3.8 Principles of Feedback

Effective feedback follows key principles that ensure clarity, usefulness, and positive impact. These principles help in improving communication, productivity, and relationships in a business environment.

1. Clarity

- Feedback should be clear, concise, and easily understandable.
- Avoid vague or ambiguous statements.
- Example: Instead of saying, "Your report needs improvement," say, "Your report could be clearer by summarizing key points in bullet form."

2. Specificity

- Focus on particular actions, behaviors, or results rather than making general statements.
- Example: Instead of "You need to work on communication," say, "Your emails could be more detailed to avoid confusion."

3. Timeliness

- Provide feedback as soon as possible after the event while the details are fresh.
- Delayed feedback may lose relevance and impact.

4. Constructiveness

- Aim to help the recipient grow rather than criticize.
- Offer solutions or suggestions for improvement.
- Example: "Your presentation lacked structure. Next time, try using an outline to organize your points better."

5. Balanced Approach

- Combine positive and constructive feedback to encourage motivation.
- The "Sandwich Method" (positive–constructive–positive) is often used for balance.
- Example: "Your introduction was engaging. To improve, try using more data in your analysis. Overall, your delivery was confident."

6. Two-Way Communication

- Encourage dialogue and allow the recipient to ask questions or provide their perspective.
- Example: "How do you feel about the suggestions? Do you think they would help?"

7. Objectivity

- Base feedback on facts and observations, not personal opinions or emotions.
- Example: Instead of "I think you are not committed," say, "I noticed that you missed two deadlines last week. Is there any issue I can help with?"

8. Consistency

- Regular feedback helps in continuous improvement rather than waiting for annual reviews.
- Constructive feedback should be part of an ongoing process.

By following these principles, feedback becomes a powerful tool for enhancing performance, building trust, and driving success in business communication.

3.9 Learning Outcomes

After studying this unit, learners will be able to understand the concept and role of feedback in effective communication. They will recognize the importance of feedback in ensuring clarity, improving performance, and maintaining two-way communication. Learners will gain the ability to identify characteristics of effective feedback and differentiate between various types of feedback used in business settings. The unit will also enable learners to apply principles of feedback to enhance interpersonal relations, employee development, and organizational communication.

3.10 Model Exam Questions:

Objective Answer Type Questions

1. What is the primary purpose of feedback?
2. Define the term Noise.
3. What is meant by bias in feedback.

Short Answers Type Questions

1. What is feedback, and why is it important in communication?
2. Explain the different types of feedback with examples.
3. How does feedback contribute to effective workplace communication?
4. Describe the characteristics of constructive feedback

Long Answers Type Questions

1. What are the differences between positive and negative feedback?
2. Explain the concept of formal and informal feedback with real-world scenarios.
3. What role does nonverbal feedback play in communication?

Unit-4 Presentation Skills

Structure

- 4.0 Objectives
- 4.1 Introduction
- 4.2 The 4Ps of Presentations
- 4.3 Types of Business Presentations
- 4.4 Evaluating and Improving Presentations
- 4.5 Case Studies and Real-Life Examples
- 4.6 Exercises
- 4.7 Learning Outcomes
- 4.8 Model Examination Questions

4.0 Objectives

After studying this unit, you will be able to:

- Explain the 4Ps of presentations
- Differentiate between different types of business presentations
- Prepare and present attractive presentations
- Evaluate presentations and develop strategies to improve them.
- Apply presentation skills through case studies and real life examples.

4.1 Introduction

Business presentations are structured communications that are delivered in a professional or corporate setting with the intention of informing, convincing, or motivating an audience. From quick project updates delivered during small team meetings to keynote addresses delivered at large-scale conferences, they cover a wide range of topics. Presentations help in guiding business decisions, influencing stakeholders, and developing organisational strategy. Business presentations enables us to clearly express complicated concepts, hence they are of great significance. They also helps us to demonstrate thought leadership and make it easier for people to work together. The global marketplace is constantly shifting and evolving. In such a market place, people and businesses can be more competitive than their rivals if they adopt open and honest communication. This can be achieved by proper business presentations. Presentations that are effective serve to establish credibility, cultivate trust, and open doors to opportunities for cooperation, investment, and entrepreneurial endeavours.

The role of presentations in professional communication of modern organizations is given below:

- To inform and educate: Presentations serve as an effective means of sharing important information such as financial reports, market analyses, or policy changes.
- To persuade and influence: By expressing ideas and benefits in a persuasive manner, presenters can gain feedback, secure approval, or support for projects and initiatives.
- To demonstrate expertise: When presenters communicate their expertise effectively, they strengthen their credibility and that of their team or department.
- To foster collaboration: Presentations can generate comments, encourage audience participation and lead to collective problem solving.

In short, presentations can bridge the gap between people of diverse backgrounds, help consolidate group understanding of complex topics, and take coordinated action.

Despite their importance, business presentations can be difficult to deliver. The most common challenges are:

- Stage fright and nervousness: Feeling nervous about speaking in front of others is common. Many people get anxious just thinking about public speaking. This nervousness can make it harder for them to express their ideas clearly. Even experienced speakers can sometimes feel nervous because of various reasons, but that should not stop them from being effective presenters.
- Audience engagement: Developing content for a diverse audience is a challenge. There are always stakeholders with varying levels of knowledge and interest in the audience. Presenting a single presentation that everyone in the audience can relate to, requires hard work. This hard work comes in the form of careful planning and dynamic delivery techniques.
- Time constraints: In most situations, presenters have limited time to deliver their message effectively. No business presentation has unlimited time for the presenter. The audience becomes disinterested easily if the presentation goes on for longer than initially planned. So, balancing perfection with brevity is a constant struggle, especially when presented to executives with tight schedules.
- Cultural and language barriers: Presenters in global organizations may face audiences from diverse cultural and linguistic backgrounds. Difference in language proficiency, cultural expectations, and interpretation of non-verbal cues can affect how a message is received. Clear and concise communication is essential for the clarity and effectiveness of the message.

- Unexpected questions: Presenters generally prepare answers to predictable questions which the audience might ask. But sometimes the question might be unexpected, for which the presenter is not prepared. Such instances confuse the presenter and might make him/her nervous or embarrassed.

Recognizing these obstacles is the first step towards overcoming them. This chapter will discuss strategies and best practices to help presenters effectively address these issues.

A good business presenter has a special set of skills that helps him/her get his/her point across easily. This not only keeps the audience interested but also meets the presentation goals. These traits help the presenter share knowledge better and also help the audience to believe and trust the presenter. Below are some important characteristics of an effective business presenter explained in detail.

- Clarity and conciseness: An effective presenter delivers his/her message in a straightforward and easy-to-understand way. He/she avoids complex terminology, and unnecessary details that might confuse the audience. If the audience struggles to follow along, the message loses its power. So effective presenters structure their speech using short and well-organized sentences. They also emphasize key points so that people remember them long after the presenter is over. Clarity helps prevent misunderstandings. Conciseness ensures the audience stays focused on the most important aspects of the discussion.
- Confidence: Confidence is essential for engaging an audience. It is conveyed through a presenter's body language, tone of voice, and eye contact. A confident speaker stands tall, speaks with authority, and makes direct eye contact with his/her listeners. Confidence not only enhances credibility but also reassures the audience that the presenter is knowledgeable and capable. Like previously mentioned, many speakers experience nervousness sometimes, but with practice, they can learn to manage their anxiety and project assurance.
- Preparation: Preparation is a very important part of giving a good presentation. A well-prepared presenter does a lot of study on their subject and organises the main points logically. He/she thinks ahead to what questions might be asked. Practice is very important for improving delivery because it helps presenters get used to their information. Preparation also includes rehearsing with visual aids, testing presentation equipment, and considering potential challenges that might arise. An experienced presenter knows how to handle unexpected situations that might arise in a presentation.

- Adaptability: The ability to adapt the presentation to different situations and audience responses is called adaptability. An effective presenter assesses the audience and adjusts his/her approach accordingly. Adaptability is important in multicultural and international settings (as will be seen in Unit 7). A skilled presenter is flexible in the face of unexpected changes, as this allows him to maintain engagement and ensure that his message is understood.
- Engagement: Keeping the audience engaged is the key to a successful presentation. An effective presenter uses storytelling, humour, and interactive elements to captivate his audience and keep them interested. This encourages participation from the audience. Engaged audiences are more likely to absorb and remember information.
- Empathy: Empathy allows a presenter to connect with their audience on an emotional level. Understanding the audience's needs, perspectives and emotions helps create a connection. An effective presenter demonstrates empathy by addressing the audience's concerns and making the content relatable to them. For example, a speaker addressing business professionals may frame their points around practical applications, while an academic audience may respond better to theoretical discussions. Demonstrating empathy creates trust with the audience as they believe that the speaker values the audience's thoughts and experiences.
- Visual literacy: The ability to design and use visual aids to improve presentation is called visual literacy. Well-structured slides, graphs, images and videos can make concepts easier to understand and remember. An effective presenter takes advantage of visual aids to support his/her message, making complex information more accessible and memorable.
- Listening skills: Active listening is an important skill that allows presenters to respond thoughtfully to audience questions and feedback. An effective presenter listens carefully and acknowledges audience input. They might also incorporate this input in their presentations on the spot. Thus, presentations become more impactful.
- Passion and enthusiasm: Passionate presenters inspire and motivate their audience. Their enthusiasm is reflected in their tone of voice and energy levels. Passion helps create a memorable and engaging experience by making the subject matter feel relevant. When presenters genuinely care about their topic, audiences can connect with the content and feel inspired by their words.

- Professionalism: Maintaining a professional demeanour throughout the presentation creates a lasting impression on the minds of the audience. It also makes sure that the result of the presentation comes out positive. Effective presenters are punctual, well-dressed (appropriate to the setting), and respectful to everyone in the room. They demonstrate good etiquette and maintain a calm demeanour. They also handle questions with courtesy. A strong professional presence reinforces a speaker's authority and reliability.

4.2 The 4Ps of Presentations

In business communication, delivering an effective presentation is not just about sharing information - it is about making an impact. Whether you are pitching an idea, persuading a client, or leading a discussion, how you present matters just as much as what you say. To master the art of presentation, we focus on four key elements known as the four Ps: planning, preparation, practice, and performance. These components provide the foundation of any successful presentation. By understanding and applying the 4Ps, presenters can improve their communication skills, build confidence, and leave a lasting impression on their audience.

4.2.1 Planning

Before crafting a presentation, ask yourself this “What is the purpose of this presentation? Am I trying to persuade? Inform? Inspire?” (We will see the types of presentation in the next section) Understanding the goal helps you prepare the content and structure the presentation effectively. A well-organized plan clarifies your message, keeps you on track, and sets the stage for success. This saves you time and stress in the later stages, as you will have a clear roadmap to guide every decision. Let us see the points to keep in mind while planning a presentation.

- Setting clear objectives: Determine whether your objective is to inform, persuade or motivate your audience. Having a clear objective shapes your entire presentation. For example, if your goal is to convince an executive committee to fund a new project, focus on ROI (return on investment), timelines, and risk analysis.
- Identifying key points: Identify two or three key messages you want the audience to remember. These become the pillars around which you build your entire presentation. For example, your key messages for a product launch presentation might be market opportunities, unique features, and competitive advantage.

- Prioritizing information: Organize your ideas according to relevance and importance. Emphasize the figures or statistics that will make the most sense to your audience. Avoid overwhelming them with unnecessary details. For example, if time is limited, focus on the most important points—such as cost savings, market share, or strategic advantages—and leave out minor details that can be provided in a handout.
- Logical flow: Once your main points are clear, organize them in a coherent way (for example, Problem → Solution → Benefits) This helps the audience understand your line of thinking. Also, give the audience a brief reminder of the previous topic before introducing the next point.
- Choosing the right medium: Use the best method to present your information like Google Slides, PowerPoint, Prezi or interactive tools or traditional whiteboards/flip charts. AI tools like Canva, Gamma, Slidesgo, Adobe etc. are also very helpful in creating presentations. Each of these has unique advantages. For example, if your presentation involves visual storytelling (for example, construction plans or design sketches), choose a platform that provides rich visual support.
- Mindfulness of time and place: Presentation need to adapt the formality to the context of its content. Boardroom sessions often require a comprehensive, data-driven approach, while conference keynotes can allow more time for detailed discussion and audience engagement.

4.2.2 Preparation

Preparation is the backbone of a well-executed presentation. It involves thorough research, organization and design. Once you have a solid plan, you can translate your strategy into concrete materials and logistics. Creating advanced content in production and designing visual aids are the implementations that you need for a smooth presentation. Here are a few helpful guidelines:

- Using Opening Hooks: An "opening hook" is the first sentence or opening statement in a written presentation that is designed to immediately capture the audience's attention and entice them to continue listening, such as a thought-provoking question, a surprising incident, or a personal story. It immediately draws attention and sets a positive tone. For example, you could start your presentation with this sentence: "Did you know that companies that invest in this technology see a 40 percent increase in productivity in just one year?"

- Simplicity and consistency: Keep text to a minimum on slides to make them look neat. Use the same font types, colour palette, and slide layout to make the presentation look professional and unified. High-quality images make slides more attractive than paragraphs of text.
- Data visualisation: Present complex statistics using clear graphs, charts, or infographics. Make sure any numbers are clearly labeled and color-coded for quick understanding. For example, for sales growth data, use a well-labeled bar or line chart to highlight trends over time.
- Developing a script or outline: Write key ideas in bullet points for each section. Try to understand the script, not to memorise it. Speaking in front of everyone by rote script destroys the attractiveness of the presentation. Creating a structured presentation outline will help you get your point across to your audience.
- Marking Expected Questions: Think critically about possible or challenging questions that may arise during the presentation. This includes addressing stakeholder objections. For example, if developing new software, expect questions about cost, security, and ROI.
- Preparing answers: Preparing answers for the expected questions is part of the presentation. You should have additional data ready to support any answer, such as spreadsheets, references, or case studies.
- Memorable closing: Conclude with an emphatic statement that reiterates your main points or issues a direct challenge or call to action. It leaves a lasting impression. Example: "Let us shape the future of our company by embracing this innovation today."

4.2.3 Practice

Delivering an effective presentation depends on one key factor: practice. Preparation ensures that the content is well organised, but it is repeated practice that turns a good presentation into a great one. With practice, a presenter can improve their content, build their confidence and prepare for potential challenges. Through frequent rehearsals, timely feedback, and thoughtful adjustments, presenters can hone their skills and ensure that their message reaches the audience in the best way possible.

- Time management: Time management is the ability to present the complete message within the allotted time. It takes repeated rehearsals to master this. To best manage time, divide your presentations into segments. The presenter must know beforehand how much time each segment takes. For example, if you have a total of 20 minutes, allocate 3 minutes for introductions, 12 minutes for key points, and 5 minutes for closing/Q&A. Consistency keeps your audience engaged and ensures you cover all the important points. Use a timer during practice sessions to ensure you are delivering the presentation within the allocated time for each section. Adjust your pacing based on the complexity of the content; spend more time on complex topics and less on straightforward ones.
- Have a peer or mentor review: Give your presentation to someone you trust, such as a colleague, friend, or mentor. Then ask for an honest review about the clarity, style, and organisation of content. Ask them clarifying questions such as, “Were the main points clear?” or “Did any part feel confusing or too long?” Their feedback can help you find areas of improvement. Encourage your reviewer to take notes during your presentation and share specific examples of what worked well and what didn’t. Consider practicing with multiple people to get diverse perspectives and insights.
- Recording yourself: You can do a video or audio recording of yourself to identify vocal tics, body language issues, or pacing issues. Speaking too fast or too slow is a put off during presentations. This can be identified when you playback the audio or video you recorded of yourself. It will also show if you use filler words like “um”, “uh”, “eh”, “huh”, “ah” excessively.
- Focus on weak spots: Identify areas where you feel less confident. Then, focus more on these areas. Practice pausing instead of saying “um” or “uh”. Vary your tone and speed to keep the audience engaged. Break down challenging sections into smaller parts and rehearse them individually before integrating them into the full presentation. Experiment with different ways to emphasize key points, such as using pauses, changes in tone, or visual aids.
- Rehearsal: “Practice makes a person perfect” – this saying makes so much more sense when you are practising for business presentations. Do multiple rehearsals in the environment where you will perform. This helps you get comfortable and ensures you can finish within the allotted time while maintaining a steady pace and tone. Familiarise yourself with the equipment and tools you will use during the presentation, such as microphones and projectors. Simulate the audience's presence by imagining their reactions and questions and preparing responses accordingly.

4.2.4 Performance

Performance is the moment where your planning, preparation, and practice come together in front of an audience. Presenting well requires confidence, adaptability, and a professional attitude. It is during the performance that the performer's energy, passion, and connection with the audience truly shine. Performance is not just about delivering content but is an art that involves engaging storytelling, effective body language, and dynamic vocal delivery. A high performance captures the audience's attention and makes the message memorable and impactful.

- Present with confidence and calmness: Take a few deep breaths before starting a presentation as this can calm nerves. Maintain good posture; keep your shoulders back and your head up.
- Dress professionally: Dress in a manner that is appropriate for the occasion and fits the culture of your organization.
- Making eye contact: If giving an in-person presentation, scan the room periodically by looking at people sitting in different parts of the hall or room. If the meeting is taking place online, look at the live webcam. Change your tone from time to time to convey the excitement of your message.
- Use interactive techniques: Ask rhetorical questions or short polls to keep your audience engaged. If time allows, encourage live Q&A, or ask participants for brief input to create a two-way communication experience.
- Challenges and adapting to unexpected situations: Even experienced presenters experience technical glitches and challenges such as equipment failure or software crashes. Keep backup files accessible on USB or the cloud. If technology fails completely, rely on verbal summaries or printed handouts.
- Be prepared for unexpected questions: Listen to the question carefully and validate the question. If you come up with an unexpected question and don't know the answer, offer to follow up via email or at a later meeting. It inspires more authenticity and a willingness to find answers than hasty guesses.
- Maintaining consistency: Repeat key points throughout the presentation. This helps the audience remember your takeaways and see the logical connection between sections.

- Upholding professional standards: Remember any privacy or compliance guidelines your organization has in place. Present only authorized data, and treat all stakeholders with respect.

Mastering these 4Ps offers a systematic path toward delivering memorable and effective business presentations. Each step depends on the previous step: you plan strategically, prepare well, practice diligently, and perform with poise. By devoting adequate time and attention to each step, you can approach your audience with clarity, confidence, and the assurance that you have done everything possible to deliver your message successfully. Whether you are developing a new product or sharing quarterly results, the 4Ps framework helps ensure that your presentation not only informs, but drives action.

4.3 Types of Business Presentations

Business presentations are an essential tool for communicating ideas, strategies and information effectively in the corporate world. Whether you are looking to inform, persuade, teach, or motivate your audience, understanding the different types of business presentations will significantly enhance your ability to deliver effective messages. Business presentations are classified based on their purpose, context, and audience, and each type of presentation has specific and unique means of achieving goals. In this section we cover a diverse range of business presentations, examine key features of each, and how they can be leveraged to meet organizational goals.

4.3.1 Informational Presentations

Informative Presentations are those presentations which are designed to share facts and data-based updates or insights. Such presentations are used in project updates where team members or stakeholders need to be informed of progress, milestones, and budget considerations or company announcements dealing with policy changes, organizational changes, or new procedures. Another frequent situation where informational Presentations are often used is financial briefings - such as quarterly earnings or annual reports.

An effective informational presentation has two important characteristics: clarity and conciseness. Presenters should present a logical progression of information from a broad overview to more detailed points. Supporting data, including charts, graphs, or tables; can be used to help the audience understand complex ideas easily. Although such presentations are not inherently persuasive but often include references to possible action items or strategic implications. Presenters should be prepared to answer specific questions about the data and it should be ensured that any details provided are directly related to the needs of the audience.

4.3.2 Persuasive Presentations

Persuasive presentations are presentations which are used to influence the audience's beliefs, decisions, or actions. These are often presented for sales pitches, investor meetings, or executive-level project proposals. For example, a startup founder may develop an investor deck to demonstrate market potential, demonstrate ROI, and highlight competitive advantages in hopes of obtaining funding.

Because persuasion depends on both logical and emotional factors, persuasive presentations often combine factual evidence—such as statistics, case studies, and Cost benefit analysis. They consist of storytelling whose content serves as a connection for the audience. Presenters should deeply understand the motivations and interests of stakeholders, emphasizing how their proposal or product aligns with those priorities. The conclusion usually features a clear call to action—whether it is in the form of further discussion, approval of a budget, or an immediate purchase.

4.3.3 Training or Instructional Presentations

Training presentations help people learn new skills or knowledge. They are mostly used in onboarding sessions, where new employees get familiar with company culture and rules. Such presentations are also seen in workshops where employees receive hands-on training on software tools, compliance standards, or project management procedures. Even product demos for customers fall into this category.

A good training presentation is clear and structured and has information divided into small, manageable parts. Presenters use interactive activities like hands-on exercises, demonstrations, and group discussions to make learning more engaging. Visual aids, real-life examples, and an open question-and-answer format help reinforce key points. The presentation becomes more effective when the presenter delivers the content with a speed according to the knowledge level of the audience.

4.3.4 Motivational or Inspirational Presentations

The goal of a motivational or persuasive presentation is to inspire and bring people together around a shared goal or set of values. These are seen in company meetings, conference keynote addresses, and team building sessions. Many times senior leaders use such presentations to celebrate accomplishments and reinforce organisational values.

Emotional connection is the key to such presentations. Speakers use personal stories and examples from real life to make their messages more relatable and powerful for the audience. This way, people can connect on a personal level and absorb the message more effectively. By focusing on possibilities and accomplishments, motivational presentations inspire optimism and a sense of collective purpose. People are interested when there is a lot of energy, good eye contact, and interesting body language. So, the presenter needs to be energetic and positive about the message they are delivering. Instead of focusing too much on specific numbers, motivational talks stress the “why” behind actions. This helps people see the bigger picture and work towards it.

4.3.5 Problem-Solving or Decision-Making Presentations

Problem-solving or decision-making presentations are designed to find problems and propose solutions. They are also used to guide teams or stakeholders towards an agreed upon outcome. They are used in management or strategy sessions, where leaders address organisational challenges such as workflow inefficiencies or resource constraints. They can also be used in crisis situations, where quick decisions are needed to minimize problems such as product defects or public relations failures.

The first step in these presentations is a clear definition of the problem to make sure that all participants share the same understanding of what needs to be solved. Presenters then analyse potential solutions, discussing the pros, cons, and risks associated with each option. Data-driven insights such as cost-benefit analyses or case studies give credibility and help decision makers evaluate the merits of different approaches. Discussion and input from various stakeholders is encouraged and a collective final decision is promoted. The presentation generally ends with a clear action plan or set of next steps, including solutions to move forward.

4.3.6 Project Proposals

A project proposal is a specific type of presentation designed to obtain approval or funding for a new initiative. These presentations outline key aspects of the proposed project like objectives, timeline, budget, and expected results. They highlight return on investment or strategic benefits, showing how the project aligns with organisational goals or solves an important problem. If the proposal involves interdepartmental collaboration or shared resources, proposers include detailed coordination and risk mitigation plans.

Because project proposals are designed to convince decision makers such as executives, investors, or cross-functional leaders, clear visuals and reliable data are essential. Charts and timelines illustrate project feasibility, while cost analyzes and risk assessments inform stakeholders. By transparently addressing concerns and reinforcing the long-term value of the project, a well-crafted proposal can move forward successfully.

4.4 Evaluating and Improving Presentations

In the previous sections, we studied what makes an effective presentation. Careful planning and execution are the ingredients of a successful presentation. But this is not it. You should have thoughtful evaluation and a willingness to adapt to make it more effective the next time. You learn from experience and continuous evaluation. If you make it a point to evaluate your presentation after each delivery, you can create a cycle of continuous improvement. This way you can enhance your content as well as your presentation style. Rigorous evaluation is beneficial to individual presenters and entire teams, as collective insights can inform best practices and raise the quality of communication in an organization.

A robust assessment process often begins with a self-assessment. Immediately after the presentation, take a few moments to reflect on its structure, pace, and clarity. You can rewind your own performance in your mind and ask yourself if you accomplished your goals and if there were any points where the audience seemed disconnected or confused. Reliving challenging moments can point to weaknesses—such as transitioning between slides or handling unexpected questions. Keeping a journal of these observations allows you to spot patterns over time and address recurring issues in future preparations.

Although self-reflection is valuable, external feedback provides a different and a more objective perspective. Peer reviews are especially helpful, as peers or mentors can highlight aspects you might overlook, such as body language, tone of voice, or how effectively you responded to audience cues. In a business context, managers or department leads can also provide important insight by linking your presentation style to broader organisational goals. Audience feedback, whether obtained through quick follow-up surveys, post-session discussions, or even informal conversations, is another rich source of information. Attendee comments on content relevance, clarity, and engagement can help you gauge the impact of your message.

In addition to gathering and reflecting on feedback, you must translate insights into actionable improvements. For example, if you found that your slides were overly dense, plan a redesign that uses less bullet points, relies more on visuals, and emphasizes key takeaways more prominently. If feedback indicates that you speak too quickly or rush through complex data, devote additional practice sessions to speed and clarity. This might include practicing with a timer or pausing after enough points to invite questions or restate important information. For those who feel uncomfortable with public speaking, engaging a professional coach or attending a communication workshop can help build confidence and authenticity. targeted Can offer techniques.

Finally, the process of evaluating and improving presentations should continue. Instead of seeing feedback as a one-time fix, approach it as part of a continuous cycle of improvement. Every new presentation provides a learning opportunity, whether it is honing your storytelling skills, improving your graphics, or mastering audience question-and-answer dynamics. By constantly embracing criticism, welcoming diverse perspectives, and experimenting with new ideas, you permanently transform into a more effective and compelling business communicator. Over time, this commitment to reflection and adaptation not only enhances your personal brand as a presenter, but also elevates the communication culture within your organization. Below are links to some YouTube videos that you may find useful in improving your presentations.

Good Presentation vs Bad Presentation - <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=V8eLdbKXGzk>

Presentation - Good/bad examples - <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=S5c1susCPAE>

4.5 Case Studies and Real-Life Examples

In this section, we discuss four illustrative case studies that demonstrate typical scenarios where presentations are given, reviewed, and improved. Each case study highlights a different challenge and offers insight into how presenters refined their approach. These examples can be adapted to different business contexts and serve as practical learning references.

Case Study 1: Giving a new manager a quarterly review

Scenario: A recently promoted manager Shaheen is tasked with presenting the quarterly results of her department to senior officers. Although she has a strong grasp of statistics, she struggles with public speaking and worries that this weakness will negatively affect her presentation.

Challenge: During her presentation, Shaheen speaks very fast, moves the slides quickly, which makes the team members not understand the information she presents. The speed makes it difficult for listeners to formulate questions or fully understand the context behind the data. Furthermore, the slides are filled with text that forces the audience to divide their attention between reading and listening.

Evaluation and Improvement: After the session, Shaheen solicits feedback from a mentor attending the meeting. She knows that both her speed and slide density are obstacles to clarity. In response, she simplifies her slides—using fewer bullet points and adding more visuals. She also uses timed rehearsals to develop a measured cadence. At the next quarterly review, senior leaders comment on how easy it is to follow her presentation, and Shaheen feels more composed and in control, indicating a marked improvement in her communication skills.

Case Study 2: Product pitch to investors

Scenario: Tahir, Chief Product Officer at a tech startup, prepares a pitch to potential investors. The goal is to secure funding for a new mobile application that leverages artificial intelligence to personalize user experiences.

Challenge: Although AI technology is sophisticated, investors are more interested in market feasibility and revenue projections than in the nitty-gritty details of algorithms. Tahir devotes much of his presentation to explaining the technical basics using complex flowcharts and slides full of code. Questions from investors in the batch show that they are still unclear about how the product will make money.

Evaluation and improvement: Tahir collects feedback directly from investors after the pitch. They emphasize the need for clear market data and a better definition of monetization strategy. In response, Tahir revises the deck to focus on financial models and user use cases, supported by brief references to the app's AI features. Investors in the next round of pitches demonstrate the power to tailor content to audience preferences, creating greater focus and appreciating progress in negotiations.

Case Study 3: Overcoming training session barriers

Scenario: Shanti is an HR manager and conducts a mandatory training session on a newly implemented project management software. The session is for a diverse group of employees—from tech-savvy staff to those with only a brief introduction to digital tools.

Challenge: Along the training, Shanti notices some participants struggling to understand the presentation. Others finish exercises quickly and become restless due to lack of interest. The mixed skill levels in the room create an uneven experience that is frustrating on both sides.

Evaluation and Improvement: Shanti collects feedback through a survey after the session. Many participants felt that the training was either too slow or too fast for their respective skills. Guided by these insights, Shanti reorganizes future sessions: a beginner's class that navigates fundamentals and focuses on essential features, and an advanced class that covers more complex functions. She also integrates short practice sessions and encourages peer group support. Attendance and satisfaction rates improve and employees feel that each session is tailored to their exact needs.

Case Study 4: Delivering a high-quality motivational speech

Scenario: Adil is a regional director of a retail chain. He is asked to deliver a keynote speech at the company's annual conference. The aim is to motivate store managers to adopt new customer service protocols and prepare for the upcoming sale season.

Challenge: Despite his enthusiasm, Adil's first draft is too data-heavy. He plans to display numerous charts and lengthy metrics to highlight the need for new protocols. During rehearsals with the conference's organizing committee, he notes that the talk feels more like a performance review than a motivational speech, which could alienate a disoriented audience.

Evaluation and Improvement: Realizing that it needed an emotional hook, Adil drew on employee success stories and customer feedback to illustrate the impact of exceptional service. He also minimizes the number of slides and focuses on big-picture topics, such as personal pride and team unity. During the actual conference he opens with a powerful story about a store manager who went the extra mile for a customer to turn around a challenging situation. A post-presentation survey shows that attendees felt inspired rather than lectured, validating Adil's shift to a more narrative-based approach.

Below are examples of some real-life presentations that demonstrate different styles, objectives, and audience interactions. A little description is added with the title or speaker so you can easily find them on YouTube by typing the exact title or speaker name. Urdu closed captions/subtitles are available in English videos.

Example 1: Steve Jobs' 2007 iPhone launch

Search video: "Steve Jobs introduces iPhone in 2007"

Type of presentation: Product announcement presentation

Why it is effective: Steve Jobs' 2007 iPhone introduction is a great example of an effective presentation. Its strength is storytelling, a technique that creates excitement and anticipation. Even when describing relatively complex technology, Jobs' simple language and logical flow maintains clarity. Most importantly, he engages the audience by gradually revealing the iPhone's features, carefully advancing information to capture their attention with each new unveiling.

Example 2: Simon Seneca Ted Talk “Start With Y”

Search video: “Simon Sinek: Start with why - How great leaders inspire action”

Type of Presentation: Motivational/ Inspirational

Key Takeaways: This presentation by Simon Sinek effectively uses a strong hook, starting with simple but thought-provoking questions that immediately draw the audience into his "Golden Circle" concept. The universal relevance of the presentation makes it resonate with a wide audience, from entrepreneurs and team leaders to anyone interested in understanding influence. Sinek's simplicity and repetition strategic usage, especially his constant emphasis on the core message "Start with Why," ensures that the key takeaway is firmly planted in the audience's mind.

Example 3: A 10-year-old girl’s sales pitch on Shark Tank America

Search video: “Shark Tank US - Baby Spoon”

Type of presentation: Persuasive presentation

Key Takeaways: Ten-year-old entrepreneur Cassidy Crowley's impressive Shark Tank pitch for a baby spoon product, Baby Toon, demonstrates the power of a clear and concise presentation. Cassidy effectively describes the problem her product solves - traditional spoons are dangerous and easily dropped - and offers her own designed solution. Her presentation, which shows how he turned an elementary school project into a market-ready product, captivates the sharks and eventually lands a contract. Cassidy's youthful confidence and composure, remarkable for her age, underscore the importance of enthusiasm and simplicity. His effective storytelling, narrating his personal journey into a product narrative, resonated with investors. Additionally, by focusing on how Baby Toon's design alleviates a real pain point for parents, she demonstrates a solid understanding of market needs and a targeted price proposition.

Example 4: Thesis presentation by Emily Johnston

Search video: “Emily Johnston - 3 minute thesis presentation”

Type of presentation: Informational presentation

Key Points: Although this is not a business presentation, Emily Johnston’s 3-minute presentation on mosquito-borne diseases is worth watching. The presentation effectively engages the audience right from the start. She begins her talk with a startling statistic highlighting the devastating impact of mosquitoes as ‘the deadliest animal on the planet.’ Johnston’s presentation is a powerful example of how clear, concise communication, combined with compelling research and humour, can effectively communicate complex scientific findings to diverse audiences. It is also worth noting that Emily did not use filler words such as “um” or “uh” and completed her presentation within the allotted three minutes. It all comes from practicing many times.

4.6 Exercises

1. Startup Product Pitch: Imagine you are the founder of a tech startup that is developing a mobile application to help users track daily habits and goals. You only have five minutes to pitch your idea to investors at a networking event, and your main goal is to convince them that your app is not only viable, but actually worthy of their financial support. First, consider what kind of opening will capture an immediate investor's interest in just a few sentences. Think about whether you want to start with surprising statistics about habit formation or a personal story that illustrates the problem your app solves. Next, consider how you will succinctly describe the app's key features, its revenue model, and any market research that supports its potential success. Finally, craft a comprehensive request or call to action—perhaps suggest a follow-up meeting or live demo—that can encourage investors to become more engaged. In a paragraph or two, write a script for your opening pitch. Then, specify which visuals, if any, you will include on a minimal set of slides to reinforce your message without overwhelming your audience.
2. Team training: Imagine yourself as an HR manager at a mid-sized software company, tasked with conducting a short training session (about 15 minutes) on remote work policies and best practices for new hires. Your goal is to make sure these new hires understand company guidelines, master the necessary communication tools, and feel supported from day one. Describe how you will structure the session so that it begins with a clear overview of the remote work policy, transitions into demonstrations of software tools (such as project management apps or communication platforms), and ends with a Q&A that clears up any lingering doubts. Consider how you can add an interactive element—such as asking participants to schedule a mock remote meeting—to help them practice what they have learned. In one paragraph, describe the logical flow of your session. In another, suggest how you would design a handful of slides or handouts to keep the content visually organized, making it easier for new hires to absorb the guidelines.
3. Executive Level Project Update: Imagine yourself leading a major marketing campaign at a large corporation. You have 10 minutes to brief the CEO, CFO, and CMO on recent milestones, current budget status, and preliminary results of your efforts. Your challenge is to balance depth and brevity, ensuring that leadership understands both the big-picture impact and the key metrics that drive success. Start by defining how you will select and present performance data, such as cost per lead or customer engagement trends, in a graph or chart that quickly tells a story. Next, discuss how you will address any budget deviations — whether you are under or over estimates — and how to structure them in a way that highlights the campaign's strategic value. Finally, consider the questions executives might ask and how you'll be prepared to confidently answer them. In one paragraph, outline a brief one-page handout that summarizes these updates. In the second paragraph, suggest a few possible executive questions and your planned responses.

4. Conference keynote presentation: Imagine you've been invited to give a 20-minute keynote address at a professional conference for digital marketers. Your chosen topic is the growing impact of artificial intelligence on personalized advertising. First, decide how you will open the conversation with a compelling story or case study that will immediately draw the audience into the world of AI-powered marketing. Then, think about presenting your research or data in a way that is accessible to a diverse group, some of whom may not have a technical background. Conclude with a futuristic perspective, offering possible predictions about future AI trends and how marketers can adapt. In one paragraph, write a brief summary that the conference can publish in advance to attract attendees. In another paragraph, list three key points you hope the audience will remember, making sure they include both high-level insights and practical advice.
5. The crisis communication: Imagine that you are responsible for handling public relations at a company that has just experienced a supply chain disruption that has caused product delivery delays. You should conduct a short (5-7 minute) presentation to the media to explain what happened, outline the steps taken to resolve the crisis, and restore public confidence. Devote a paragraph to discussing why you immediately recognize the problem and take accountability, and how to structure your startup to summarize the immediate steps taken. In a separate paragraph, mention how you will highlight future security measures, making sure you end on a positive note that affirms the company's commitment to customers. This exercise challenges you to maintain clarity and relaxation under pressure.

4.7 Learning Outcomes

Business presentations are a cornerstone of professional communication, serving diverse purposes such as informing, persuading, educating, and motivating audiences. Whether delivering quarterly reports, pitching new ideas to investors, or training employees, effective presentations can influence decisions, establish credibility, and foster collaboration.

The 4Ps of Presentations—Planning, Preparation, Practice, and Performance—offer a structured approach to delivering impactful messages. Planning ensures clear objectives and logical flow, while thorough preparation refines content, visual aids, and anticipated questions. Repeated practice builds confidence, hones delivery, and helps presenters manage time effectively. Finally, strong performance engages the audience through clarity, enthusiasm, and adaptability. Business presentations come in various types, including informational presentations that focus on delivering data and insights, persuasive presentations aimed at influencing decisions, training sessions designed for skill-building, motivational speeches that inspire action, problem-solving presentations that guide teams toward solutions, and project proposals that secure approval or funding. Each type requires a tailored approach to meet the audience’s needs and objectives.

Presenters often encounter challenges such as stage fright, disengaged audiences, cultural and language barriers, time constraints, and unexpected questions. Overcoming these hurdles requires preparation, flexibility, and a deep understanding of effective communication techniques. Successful presenters exhibit clarity, confidence, empathy, adaptability, visual literacy, and professionalism, ensuring their message resonates with the audience.

Continuous improvement is essential, and self-assessment, peer reviews, and audience feedback play a critical role in refining presentation skills. Learning from past experiences and adapting based on constructive critiques enhances both delivery and content structure. By mastering these principles, presenters can communicate persuasively, adapt to diverse audiences, and create meaningful connections that drive action.

4.8 Model Examination Questions

Objective Answer Type Questions

- Which of the following is not one of the 4Ps of presentations?
A) Planning B) Profit C) Preparation D) Performance
- A presentation designed to persuade an audience to take a specific action is called:
A) Informative presentation B) Training presentation
C) Impressive presentation D) Persuasive presentation
- Which of the following is an important aspect of effective preparation for a presentation?

- A) Memorise it word by word.
 - B) Practicing the presentation several times.
 - C) Creating slides with as much text as possible.
 - D) Avoiding any interaction with the audience.
4. Write any two characteristics of an effective presenter.
 5. What is the best way to apply the 4Ps methods in the work environment?
 - A) Using exactly the same method for each type of audience.
 - B) Avoiding rehearsing to appear more spontaneous.
 - C) Adapting your style based on the purpose of the presentation.
 - D) Skipping the planning phase to save time and simply execute.
 6. A presentation whose purpose is to increase the knowledge or understanding of the audience is classified as _____.
 7. A well-structured presentation usually includes an introduction, body, and _____.
 8. Collecting _____ after giving a presentation helps speakers identify areas for improvement. (Feedback/Stationery)
 9. If someone from the audience asks an unexpected question, it should be completely ignored. (True/false?)
 10. Avoiding excessive use of filler words or eye contact improves presentation. (True/false?)

Answers:

- | | |
|--------------|------------------------------|
| 1.B | 2.D |
| 3.B | 4.Clarity and confidence |
| 5.C | 6.Informational presentation |
| 7.Conclusion | 8.Feedback |
| 9.False | 10. True |

Short Answer Type Questions

1. Explain the role of presentations in professional communication of modern organizations.
2. Highlight some important characteristics of an effective business presenter.
3. Write notes on importance of preparation in presentation.
4. Briefly describe two strategies you can use to capture your audience's attention at the beginning of a business presentation.
5. What are the benefits of using clear and concise language in a business presentation?

6. Explain the role of body language and eye contact in enhancing communication during a business presentation.
7. Explain the challenges faced in making a business presentation.
8. Define project proposal. What kind of presentation is this?
9. What is meant by a persuasive presentation? What is its purpose?
10. Sarfaraz has been asked to give a presentation to potential investors about a new mobile app his company has developed. In order to effectively convince investors, suggest four key points for Sarfraz to prepare this presentation.

Long Answer Type Questions

1. Explain in detail the essential steps involved in planning and preparing a successful business presentation.
2. Explain in detail the role of communication skills in making a persuasive presentation.
3. Critically evaluate common mistakes made by presenters during business presentations. Suggest strategies to avoid these mistakes and maintain audience engagement.
4. Discuss strategies for effectively managing audience interaction and question sessions. Explain what techniques can be used to deal with difficult or unexpected questions.
5. Explain the advantages, and key principles of incorporating visual aids into presentations. Mention if there are any disadvantages.

Unit-5 Speaking-I

Structure

- 5.0 Objectives
- 5.1 Introduction
- 5.2 Choosing a Method of Speaking
- 5.3 Analysing the Audience
- 5.4 Non-verbal Dimensions of Presentations
- 5.5 Learning Outcomes
- 5.6 Model Examination Questions

5.0 Objectives

After studying this unit, you will be able to:

- Identify and apply various speaking techniques suitable for professional and academic settings.
- Analyse audience demographics and psychographics to tailor communication effectively.
- Employ non-verbal communication strategies to enhance message delivery and audience engagement.
- Demonstrate confidence and clarity in diverse speaking contexts such as presentations, meetings, and interviews.

5.1 Introduction

Communication is an important skill that is an essential component of professional success. Whether you are presenting a business plan, expressing your opinion in a meeting, or motivating employees, your communication style directly affects the effectiveness of your message. The aim of this unit is to expose students to three key elements that are essential to a successful presentation: communication technique, audience analysis, and non-verbal aspects. The importance of each element and its correct use will help you master your conversation.

In the first important factor ‘communication technique’, you will learn which method is appropriate to use in different situations, such as impromptu conversation, conversation with notes, or memorized conversation. Each method is chosen according to its circumstances and objectives. In addition, you will also learn how to use the appropriate method to make your presentation effective so that you better convey your message to the audience.

The next important factor is ‘audience analysis’ in which you try to understand who your audience is and what their needs are. You need to adapt your speaking style to the audience's age, gender, educational background, and culture. Likewise, you will learn how you can monitor audience response and make changes to your presentation based on their feedback.

The third element 'non-verbal aspects' is, such as your body language, tone of voice, and appearance. All of these aspects have a profound impact on the message, and you need to learn how you can use your non-verbal cues effectively to create a deep connection with your audience.

By the end of this unit, you will be able to understand and use these three elements in practice, which will significantly improve your presentation and convey your message more effectively and confidently.

5.2 Choosing a Method of Speaking

There are many methods of communication, and each method is adapted to specific situations, purposes, and audiences. Choosing an effective speaking technique depends on how much preparation time the speaker has had, the nature of the audience, and the purpose of the speech. A successful presentation requires that the speaker not only optimises his content but also choose the right delivery style. Common methods of conversation include impromptu conversation, conversation with notes, addressed conversation, and memorized conversation.

1. Impromptu Speaking

Impromptu speaking involves delivering a speech without prior preparation. It requires quick thinking, confidence, and the ability to choose effective words. This method is commonly used when answering a sudden question in a meeting or providing guidance in an unexpected situation. On such occasions, an effective speaker quickly organises his/her thoughts and delivers a concise speech. But the biggest challenge with this approach is that mistakes and disjointed conversations are more likely. So those who want to master this skill, should increase their general knowledge, so that they can discuss every topic quickly.

Example: If a manager is suddenly asked "What is the progress of your project?", he has to give a clear and effective answer without any preparation.

2. Extemporaneous Speaking

This is a method in which the speaker researches the topic, prepares notes of important points, and then uses them to speak in a frank and natural manner. Instead of memorising the entire text or reading from a document, only the main points and guidelines are noted, so that the speaker can maintain a direct connection with the audience during the conversation. This method is considered most suitable for business presentations, training sessions, or meetings with clients, as it maintains freedom and naturalness. The challenge of this method is that if the speaker relies too much on notes, the connection with the audience can be weak.

Example: Communicate with the help of notes to convince the sales team at the launch of a new product, so that trust and effectiveness are maintained.

3. Manuscript Speaking

Manuscript speech is a style in which the speaker prepares a complete text and reads it aloud. This method is suitable for formal occasions, legal statements, or technical topics, where precise wording and careful communication are essential. Its main advantage is that there is less chance of error. But if the speaker is dependent only on reading the text, his speech can feel lifeless and ineffective.

Example: Delivering a keynote address at an industry conference.

4. Memorised Speaking

In a memorised speech, the speaker memorises the entire speech and presents it without any paper. This method is suitable for short, impactful speeches such as acceptance speeches, award ceremonies, or motivational speaking. Its main advantage is that the speaker looks confident and engaged, but if he misses a point during the conversation, the presentation can suffer.

Example: Giving a short and passionate CEO speech on a company's 10th anniversary.

Choosing the right method

Now that we know the types of speeches, let us look at the factors to keep in mind while selecting a speaking method. There are several important factors to consider before choosing the appropriate method for any talk, such as the purpose of the presentation, the expectations of the audience, and the time available for preparation. If the purpose of a presentation is to inform the audience, a conversation with notes will be better, while if the purpose is to persuade an action, an enthusiastic and frank style will be more effective. Similarly, if time is short, impromptu talk or talk with notes can be chosen, but if time is more, correspondence or memorized talk can be worked on. It is also important to consider the nature of the audience, as formal audiences (such as a board of directors) prefer an address style, while informal audiences (such as students or employees) prefer conversations with notes. A good presentation requires that the speaker be flexible to the situation, understand the audience's reactions, and practice his speech.

Example: If you are offering a new service to a client, use conversation with notes to maintain both trust and preciseness.

Self-Review Question:

1. Which method do you use the most and why? What can be done to improve it?

5.3 Analysing the Audience

Audience analysis is the process of identifying and understanding the characteristics, expectations, needs, interests, and potential responses of the people you are addressing in a communication situation. Why is audience analysis important? It is important because the success of any presentation or conversation depends on how well the speaker understands the audience. If the audience's needs, interests, and background are ignored, not only may the message fail to be delivered effectively, but the audience may also express disinterest. A successful speaker always prioritises audience analysis in order to adapt the content, style, and delivery of the presentation accordingly. The same message can be presented in different ways to different audiences. Understanding this difference is the essence of great communication. For example, a presentation to students in an academic seminar on the same topic will be simple and descriptive, while presenting the same topic in a corporate meeting will require a technical and data-driven approach.

Key dimensions of audience analysis

There are some basic points to remember to understand the audience. Demographics such as age, gender, educational background, and occupation influence the content and style of conversation. Younger audiences tend to be more innovative and creative, while older audiences place more emphasis on experience and traditions. Similarly, an audience at an engineering seminar will prefer technical details, while marketing professionals will prefer a more creative and visual style of discussion. Cultural background is also an important factor; Western audiences prefer a direct style, while Eastern societies value indirect and polite styles more.

Psychological aspects also play an important role in the effectiveness of communication. It is important to understand the interests and values (psychographics) so that the conversation matches the expectations of the audience. Some people are interested in new technology and innovation, while others prefer financial benefits and business development. Similarly, some audiences are open to change, while others prefer traditional methods. The speaker should adapt his speech to the preferences of the audience. For example, if a manager wants to convince his team to adopt a new policy, he needs to communicate their values, concerns, and expectations so that they are willing to accept the change.

Here is a quick glance at the key dimensions we discussed above:

- Demographics: Age, gender, education level, and profession influence message tone and content.
- Psychographics: Interests, values, beliefs, and attitudes determine how the audience interprets the message.
- Cultural Factors: Cultural background affects preferences for directness, formality, and non-verbal cues.
- Knowledge Level: Presentations should be adapted based on the audience's familiarity with the topic.
- Expectations: Understanding what the audience hopes to gain allows for more targeted and effective delivery.

Techniques for analysing the audience

It is also important to accurately assess the knowledge level of the audience. If the audience is inexperienced in a particular topic, they must provide basic information and explanations in plain language. Content can be made a little more technical for an intermediate audience, while more depth and specific details are necessary for an expert audience. Also, it is important to understand the audience's expectations—are they simply looking for information, practical solutions, or inspiration on a topic? The speaker should tailor his presentation to these expectations in order to maintain the audience's interest. Some techniques are as follows:

- Pre-event surveys or interviews to gather data on audience preferences.
- Reviewing organizational profiles and participant lists.
- Consulting event organizers for insights into audience composition.
- Observing audience reactions during the presentation to adjust tone or content in real-time.
- The speaker can also gauge the audience's response by asking questions, such as “Are you familiar with this concept?” or “What do you expect on this topic?”

Common mistakes to avoid

1. Assuming all audiences are the same: Not every audience thinks, feels, or responds in the same way. What works for one group might not work with another. So it is important to know who you are talking to and adjust your approach.

2. Ignoring cultural sensitivities: When we overlook cultural differences, even a well-meaning message can come across as insensitive or offensive. A little awareness and respect for others' backgrounds can go a long way in building trust.
3. Overloading technical details for non-expert audiences: Throwing in too much jargon or complex information can leave people lost and disengaged. It is better to explain things in a way that is easy to follow. You can make it feel like you are having a conversation, not giving a lecture.
4. Failing to read non-verbal cues such as disinterest or confusion: If people look bored or puzzled, that is a sign that something is not right. Paying attention to body language or facial expressions can help you adjust your delivery on the spot.

Best Practices

Effective communicators continuously adapt their style to suit different audiences. This includes modifying language, examples, and delivery style to ensure clarity, relevance, and engagement.

Self-Review Question:

1. How much did you understand your audience in your presentations? Can you meet their expectations?

5.4 Non-verbal aspects of presentations

According to research, 70-90% of effective communication consists of non-verbal elements. Words are important in their own right, but your body language, voice, and appearance have a profound effect on the audience. Nonverbal cues not only convey the speaker's confidence and professionalism, but also help establish an emotional connection with the audience, gain their attention, and clarify the message.

1. Body language

Posture

- Standing straight shows confidence and professionalism, while slouching or drooping shoulders indicates weakness, exhaustion, or disinterest.
- It is important to stand calm and steady in front of the audience, so that your speech sounds more serious and impressive.
- Also pay attention to the way you sit. Leaning back in a chair can show inattention and laziness, while leaning forward can be a sign of interest and dynamism.

- Avoid repetitive or distracting movements.

Gestures

- Effective use of hands helps to make a point clear, such as using fingers while counting or holding open hands to emphasize a particular point.
- Anxious movements such as playing with hair, putting hands in pockets, or repeatedly clasping hands can have a negative effect on the audience.
- Appropriate gestures help keep the audience's attention, such as using the hands dynamically to convey an important point.

Movement

- Walk with purpose shows confidence and mastery of the speaker. If you are speaking in a large hall, moving around the stage appropriately can connect with different parts of the audience.
- Wandering around aimlessly, walking quickly, or standing still in one place can be a sign of anxiety, uncertainty, or unpreparedness.
- If the audience is losing attention, moving closer to them or changing hand gestures can restore their interest.

Facial Expressions

- A genuine smile creates rapport with the audience and makes the conversation more engaging.
- An exaggerated or artificial smile can feel unnatural, so it is important to adopt an appropriate and realistic expression.
- Facial expressions on serious topics should also be appropriate, so that the audience knows which point in your conversation should be given more attention.

Eye Contact

- Make direct eye contact which establishes trust with the audience and helps retain their attention.
- Avoid staring, as this can make the audience feel uncomfortable.
- If the audience group is large, try to include everyone by looking at different segments.
- Cultural differences are also important, as in some cultures excessive eye contact is considered impolite, while in Western societies it is considered a sign of confidence.

2. Paralanguage (voice)

Tone

- Warmth and affectation in tone increases audience interest, while a cold and monotonous tone conveys apathy and disinterest.
- During a presentation, it is important to use an enthusiastic, confident, or soft tone depending on the audience.

Pitch and volume

- Increase the volume to emphasize important points, but too loud may sound unnecessary.
- For sensitive and serious topics, it is better to adopt a soft voice to get the audience's attention.
- Adjust the volume according to the size of the room. Be loud enough in a large hall and moderate in a small room.

Pace

- Speak slowly as it is important to clarify difficult or complex topics. Speaking quickly helps create excitement.
- Speaking too fast can confuse the audience, while speaking too slowly can bore them.

Pauses

- Taking a break after important points gives the audience a chance to think and increases the impact of the speech.
- Use silence effectively to avoid unnecessary "um, ah" words

3. Appearance

- The first impression your dress and overall personality makes on the audience is very important.
- For formal occasions, a suit or traditional professional attire is best, while for informal occasions, a slightly more casual but dignified attire is acceptable.
- Clothes should be clean and ironed, and the overall preparation should be such that it makes a positive impression on the audience.

4. Proxemics

- Standing close to the audience helps build rapport, while standing too far away can show distaste.
- Room setting is also part of non-verbal communication. If possible, do not place obstacles (such as tables) in front of the audience so that the conversation is more direct and effective.

- Spacing also varies culturally - shorter spacing is adopted in Indian, Latin and Middle Eastern cultures, while longer spacing is preferred in European countries.

All elements of nonverbal communication viz body language, voice, appearance, and use of distance, play a key role in making a speaker's speech effective and influential. By mastering these aspects, a speaker can communicate more effectively to the audience and leave a lasting impression on their hearts and minds.

Impact of non-verbal communication

As important as words are in conversation, there are also non-verbal cues, which can increase or decrease the impact of a conversation. Positive gestures, such as open body language, smiling, and appropriate hand gestures, increase the audience's trust and interest, while negative gestures, such as folded arms, averting eyes, or looking down at the ground, can create a sense of distrust and distance. An effective speaker can maintain the audience's attention and interest by improving his non-verbal behaviour. If the audience feels that the speaker is nervous, unconfident, or disinterested, they will not be positively impacted by the conversation, no matter how strong the content. Therefore, it is very important to control your hands, facial expressions, and movements while speaking.

Positive and negative indicators

Positive cues attract the audience and help them believe the speaker's message more. Open body language, such as having open arms and leaning the body toward the audience, conveys confidence and warmth. Similarly, smiling creates a positive connection with the audience and makes them interested in the conversation. Appropriate hand gestures can be used to illustrate or emphasize something, such as using fingers while counting or pointing with the hand to an important point. On the other hand, negative gestures such as arm folding, which shows defensiveness or disinterest, or repeated looking down at the ground, which can show nervousness or lack of self-confidence, can prevent the audience from paying full attention to the speaker. Signs of restlessness, such as frequent hand waving, fiddling with clothes, or gesturing unnecessarily, can distract the audience and detract from the seriousness of the presentation.

Practical Tips

Here are some tips for you to improve your speaking skills in the business world.

- Record and review your presentations to observe your non-verbal habits.

- Practice in front of peers for constructive feedback.
- Adjust non-verbal behaviour based on audience response.
- Maintain authenticity—avoid exaggerated expressions or forced gestures.

Self-Review Question:

1. What message did your non-verbal cues convey in your previous presentation?

5.5 Learning Outcomes

After studying this unit, students can now:

- Differentiate between speaking methods and apply them appropriately in business and academic contexts.
- Conduct comprehensive audience analysis and adapt presentations accordingly.
- Utilize non-verbal cues to enhance communication effectiveness.
- Deliver presentations confidently using verbal and non-verbal strategies.
- Communicate persuasively in meetings, client presentations, and public forums.

5.6 Model Examination Questions

Multiple Choice Questions

1. How many basic ways of speaking are there?
 - A. Two
 - B. Three
 - C. Four
 - D. Punch
2. What is an impromptu conversation?
 - A. Correspondence
 - B. Memorized Conversations
 - C. Impromptu conversation
 - D. Discussion with notice
3. What is the most important aspect of audience analysis?
 - A. Age of audience
 - B. Audience background
 - C. Audience expectations
 - D. All of these
4. What percentage of communication is non-verbal?
 - A. 20-30%
 - B. 40-50%
 - C. 70-90%
 - D. 100%
5. What is the most important element in body language?
 - A. Clothing
 - B. Eye contact
 - C. Tone of voice
 - D. Distance Use
6. What does warmth in tone of voice indicate?
 - A. Aversion
 - B. Interest
 - C. Anger
 - D. Exhaustion
7. How do cultural influences affect nonverbal cues?

- A. No effect
 - B. There is a positive effect
 - C. There is a negative effect
 - D. Interpretation may vary
8. What type of presentation is conversation with notes suitable for?
- A. Ceremonial gathering
 - B. Business offering
 - C. Legality of statements
 - D. Prize Ceremony
9. What is the biggest benefit of a memorised conversation?
- A. The probability of error is reduced
 - B. Trust and attention are maintained
 - C. The connection with the audience is strengthened
 - D. Saves time
10. What method can be used for audience analysis?
- A. Questionnaires
 - B. Observation
 - C. Both A and B
 - D. None of these

Short Answer Type Question

1. Explain the methods of communication.
2. Explain the importance of audience analysis.
3. What are the basic elements of non-verbal communication?
4. Explain the difference between positive and negative non-verbal cues.
5. How do cultural influences affect nonverbal cues?

Long Answer Type Question

1. How to choose the appropriate communication style for an effective presentation? Explain.
2. Explain in detail various aspects of audience analysis.
3. Explain the importance of non-verbal communication and its various elements.

Unit 6-Speaking-II

Structure

- 6.0 Introduction
- 6.1 Objectives
- 6.2 Importance of Advanced Oral Communication
- 6.3 Speeches for Commemorative Occasions
- 6.4 Effective Presentation Strategies
- 6.5 Persuasive Speaking in Business
- 6.6 Elevator Pitch and Brief Professional Speeches
- 6.7 Analysing and Critiquing Professional Speeches
- 6.8 Learning Outcomes

6.0 Introduction

For MBA candidates who are interested in pursuing positions of leadership and management, the ability to communicate effectively orally is an essential asset. In today's highly competitive corporate climate, one's capacity to articulate ideas in a clear and concise manner, to motivate teams, to influence stakeholders, and to communicate vision in a convincing manner is a crucial factor in determining one's level of success. Communication skills that are strong contribute not only to an increase in personal credibility but also directly to the effectiveness of an organization and the impact that leadership has.

There are many different types of public speaking situations that managers participate in on a regular basis. These include presentations, pitches, speeches for commemorative occasions, persuasive negotiations, and informal encounters. Master of Business Administration students who develop excellent oral communication skills are better prepared to excel in various professional settings, which contributes to their ability to achieve strategic goals and promote significant change. We will study all these types of speaking situations and the type of speech each situation demands.

6.1 Objectives

On completing the lesson, learners will be able to:

- Explain company concepts and tactics in diverse speaking situations.
- Present professionally with clarity, conciseness, coherence, and confidence.
- Improve credibility and audience engagement with effective verbal and nonverbal communication.

- Analyse audience needs and adjust communication techniques to cultural variety and circumstance.
- Review and critique their own and others' speaking performances.

6.2 Importance of Advanced Oral Communication

For someone in management and leadership roles, having strong communication abilities is essential to achieving success. Leaders that who able to communicate clearly and effectively have the ability to inspire and motivate their teams, achieve organizational goals in a comprehensive manner, and successfully manage change. Good oral communication not only makes a leader more trustworthy, but it also helps team members trust each other. A big effect is also felt in the decision-making process. Leaders who are good at speaking are better at persuading stakeholders, negotiating, and handling tough or problematic business problems with confidence. Business professionals have to talk to people in a variety of settings that require different communication skills. Important settings include:

- Formal presentations: Delivering structured presentations during meetings, conferences, or boardroom sessions.
- Persuasive pitches: Presenting business ideas to investors, clients, or stakeholders in an effort to get their support or buy-in.
- Commemorative speeches: Speaking at important events like retirements, organisational goals, or accomplishments to mark them.
- Negotiations: Effectively articulating and strategically shaping results during negotiations or conflict resolution.
- Informal interactions: Organising successful team briefings, meetings, and unofficial conversations to keep continuous and clear communication.

Self-assessment exercise: Now, take a moment to critically assess your own speaking abilities. As a potential manager, you should know your strengths and weaknesses so that you can work on them.

Statement	Score (1-5)
1. I feel confident when speaking in front of groups.

2. I clearly articulate my ideas, even without extensive preparation.
3. I effectively use eye contact, gestures, and posture while speaking.
4. I speak at an appropriate pace (not too fast or slow) and volume.
5. I handle audience questions calmly and confidently.
6. I structure my presentations logically with clear introductions and conclusions.
7. I use stories, examples, or data effectively to enhance my messages.
8. My persuasive messages often achieve their intended outcomes.
9. I manage nervousness effectively during presentations or speeches.
10. I comfortably handle unexpected disruptions or challenges while speaking.

Interpreting your score:

- 41–50: Excellent! You are confident in many speaking situations and possess great communication abilities. Emphasise on improving your style and including sophisticated methods.
- 31–40: Good. Your foundation is strong, but there is need in some areas. Sort your lowest scores and work from there.
- 21–30: Fair. Your speaking ability calls for targeted effort and training. To boost confidence, think about extra practice, peer comments, or expert instruction.
- Below 20: Needs Improvement. You may experience anxiety or have significant skill gaps. Commit to structured practice, training, and seek feedback regularly.

Now, write down three speaking strengths and three areas you aim to develop during this unit. Reflecting on these points will provide clarity on where to focus your improvement efforts. Keep revisiting this section to assess your progress.

6.3 Speeches for commemorative occasions

It is common practice for organisations to offer commemorative speeches in order to honour, celebrate, or recognize major milestones, achievements, or changes within the organization. They aim to inspire and evoke emotions, connecting the speaker and the audience through shared values and memories. Since MBA students are future managers and leaders, they will frequently find themselves in positions that require them to deliver these presentations in professional settings. Let us see the most common commemorative speaking scenarios in business.

1. Company anniversaries: Company or corporate anniversaries are occasions celebrating a business milestone since the founding of the company. They celebrate the organisation's growth, achievements, and legacy over time. The speeches delivered on such occasions by leaders typically highlight organisational accomplishments, emphasize core values, and inspire continued growth and loyalty. Leaders talk about what they have done well, thank workers for their work, and lay out plans for the future. Example: At a company's 10th anniversary party, the CEO will give a speech in which he or she will talk about the company's biggest wins, thank long-term employees, and stress the company's dedication to new ideas and the environment.
2. Award ceremonies: Award ceremonies are an opportunity to recognise workers or teams for their exceptional contributions, like long-term service or great work. These events honour people, groups, or departments that have reached big goals or finished big projects. They do this by boosting inspiration and teamwork. During these events, people give speeches that are meant to honour, thank, and inspire. They highlight specific achievements of awardees, support the values of the company, and motivate others to do their best. Example: A manager of a department making a speech at an annual awards ceremony to praise the hard work of a team and encourage others to do the same.
3. Farewell and retirement events: Farewell and retirement parties are held to recognise the hard work of employees and thank them for their service. People who are leaving their jobs are praised for their work and accomplishments at these events, which also wish them the best in the future. At these events, speeches are mostly about the individual's personal accomplishments, job highlights, and how they have helped co-workers and the organisation. Such speeches use a business tone while also being friendly and grateful, and they often share interesting stories and words of thanks. Example: A team leader delivering a heart-warming speech for a retiring colleague, recounting major career accomplishments and personal contributions.
4. Grand opening or product launches: Grand openings or product launches mark the introduction of significant new business initiatives, such as launching new products, branches, or business ventures. In these instances, commemorative speeches are given to honour the work that led up to the launch, to describe the strategic importance of the launch, and to promote excitement and optimism among employees, customers, and stakeholders. Some of the speakers highlight the importance of collaboration, creativity, and the future prospects that the project will offer. Example: A marketing director speaking at the launch of a new product, acknowledging team effort and outlining the market potential.

5. Special tributes: Special tribute speeches honour influential individuals or key stakeholders who have had a profound impact on an organisation, industry, or community. Tributes may occur after major personal achievements, retirements, or even memorial services. These speeches highlight the individual's significant achievements, personal qualities, and legacy. They aim to evoke a sense of gratitude, respect, and continued inspiration among listeners. Tribute speeches blend professionalism with sincere emotion, conveying genuine appreciation. Example: A senior executive paying tribute to a former CEO who transformed the company's direction and values, shaped its enduring success and culture.

6.4 Effective Presentation Strategies

Having the ability to effectively present information enables managers and leaders to convey their vision, convince stakeholders, and develop confidence within their communities. Highly effective presenters are able to express difficult concepts in a way that is easily understood. This fosters trust and enhances their professional credibility. Successful business communication demands clarity, conciseness, coherence, and confidence (as studied in Unit 4)

- Clarity: Clearly define your objectives and message to prevent misunderstandings.
- Conciseness: Be brief yet informative - respect your audience's time and attention.
- Coherence: Organize your message logically to help the audience follow your ideas.
- Confidence: Speak with authority and conviction to enhance your credibility and influence.

The following are effective presentation strategies.

1. Audience Analysis and Message Adaptation: As we have studied in unit 5, understanding your audience and analysing it is critical to effective communication. We will brush up the points from the last unit here. Knowing your audience means knowing who they are, what their needs, expectations, and choices are. This understanding helps you customize your message for maximum relevancy and effect. Here is how you can have audience aware and tailor your message:

- a. Identify audience needs and expectations: Start by defining important groups, including age, occupation, cultural background, and hobbies, to reach audience awareness. This knowledge guides your creation of material fit for their expectations and experience. Just as vital is realizing why you are communicating—are you motivating, amusing, informative, or persuasive? Clearly defined objectives guarantee that your message fits the demands of the audience. Changing your language, tone, material, and delivery approach will help you to fit the particular audience. In a commercial environment, for instance, use professional language and concentrate on data-driven arguments. In a casual environment, a conversational tone and relevant examples could be more successful.
 - b. Cultural awareness: Cultural sensitivity is also important. Knowing about cultural variations in language, gestures, and values helps to prevent misinterpretation and fosters trust.
 - c. Engage your audience: Interactive methods such as posing questions or distributing relevant stories help the viewers stay involved. Including them helps you to make the message more unforgettable and powerful. In the end, audience knowledge together with careful message adaptation improves communication efficacy, thereby assuring that your thoughts are not only heard but also really appreciated.
2. Structuring Your Presentation: A well-structured presentation ensures your audience stays engaged and your message resonates. Follow these enhanced steps for a compelling delivery:
- a. Introduction: The introduction is your chance to make a strong first impression. Use it to clearly set the tone and establish your authority. Clearly define what your presentation aims to achieve.
 - b. Main body: This is the heart of your presentation, where you elaborate on your main points with clarity and precision. Organize your slides logically. Divide your content into 2–4 clear sections or key points to avoid overwhelming your audience with visual clutter.
 - c. Conclusion: Restate the main takeaway or the central theme of your presentation succinctly. Summarize key points. End with a powerful quote, a story that resonates, or a striking visual.
3. Verbal and Non-verbal Communication: Both verbal and non-verbal cues significantly influence audience perception and message effectiveness.

- a. Verbal Communication: Verbal communication refers to the use of spoken or written words to convey a message. It involves language, tone, pace, and clarity to express thoughts, ideas, or information effectively. Examples include conversations, speeches, presentations, emails, and written reports.
 - i. Language choice: Use clear, professional, audience-appropriate vocabulary.
 - ii. Tone and Pace: Modulate your voice to maintain interest and emphasise key points.
 - b. Non-verbal Communication: Nonverbal communication includes everything that isn't said but helps communicate meaning. This includes facial emotions, gestures, eye contact, posture, and the space between people. Most of the time, nonverbal cues improve spoken conversation by giving it more depth and emotion.
 - i. Body language: Maintain open gestures and strong posture to project confidence.
 - ii. Eye contact: Regular eye contact builds trust and engagement.
 - iii. Facial expressions: Align expressions with your message to reinforce meaning.
4. Overcoming Anxiety and Enhancing Confidence: Professionals often have trouble speaking in public. Feelings of worry, nervousness, or unease are all signs of anxiety. These feelings are usually about something that is uncertain or whose result is unknown. It is a normal reaction to worry, and it is common for physical symptoms like sweating, tensing up, or a faster heart rate to go along with it. Practical strategies to manage and overcome anxiety are:
- a. Preparation and practice: Not only does learning your material inside and out reduce doubt, it also boosts your confidence. Do a lot of practice, either alone, in front of a mirror, with a small group of people, or even by recording yourself.
 - b. Visualization techniques: Imagine yourself delivering a successful presentation, receiving positive reactions, and achieving your goals. This mental rehearsal helps create a sense of familiarity and control.
 - c. Breathing and relaxation exercises: Breathing and relaxation exercises are practical tools to calm your nerves. Deep breathing before and during your presentation reduces stress, stabilizes your voice, and centres your focus.

All the above techniques cannot be mastered in a day. They take time. With patience and practice, one can overcome anxiety and exude confidence. Start with smaller, low-pressure speaking opportunities and gradually move to more significant ones. Celebrate small victories along the way to reinforce your self-belief. Remember, the audience are not your adversary; they are there to listen and engage. Shifting your perspective to focus on the value you bring to them can help redirect nervous energy into a positive, engaging presence. Also, you may also face some presentation challenges which you can manage by employing the techniques discussed in unit 4

6.5 Persuasive Speaking in Business

Persuasion is an essential element of business communication. It is crucial for leaders, managers, entrepreneurs, and consultants. Effective persuasive speaking enables professionals to influence opinions, guide decisions, secure support, and inspire action among diverse stakeholders. In business, persuasion involves presenting ideas and arguments clearly so that they inspire listeners to adopt certain beliefs, behaviors or decisions aligned with organizational goals. Here are some scenarios where managers use persuasive speaking:

- To convince executives or boards to support strategic decisions.
- To obtain funding or resources for projects.
- To persuade clients or customers to buy products and services.
- To inspire employees to embrace change or adopt new policies.
- To effectively negotiate agreements and contracts.

The art of persuasion is called rhetoric. Aristotle identified three persuasive appeals which leverage classical principles which are still highly relevant in business contexts today.

1. Ethos (Credibility): Ethos refers to the credibility, trustworthiness, and authority of the speaker. It emphasizes the speaker's character, expertise, experience, or position within the organization or industry. When listeners perceive a speaker as credible, knowledgeable, and trustworthy, they are more likely to accept the speaker's message. Establishing ethos involves clearly demonstrating your qualifications, background, and reliability in relation to your argument.

Strategies to build Ethos:

- Clearly mention relevant professional experience or qualifications.
- Reference respected industry sources or your successful track record.
- Demonstrate integrity, honesty, and consistency throughout your speech.

Example 1: "With over a decade of successful project management experience, I have seen first-hand how our investment in employee wellness directly improves productivity."

Example 2: “Having managed successful marketing campaigns for Fortune 500 companies over the past 12 years, I can assure you that our proposed strategy will significantly boost our market visibility and profitability.”

2. Pathos (Emotional appeal): Pathos involves appealing to the audience's emotions, values, and motivations. It is the emotional connection between the speaker's message and the audience's feelings or personal values. Emotional engagement creates connections, motivating audiences to respond positively. Pathos is effective when dealing with human-centric issues, ethical considerations, or organisational changes impacting people directly.

Strategies to create pathos

- Share relatable stories, vivid examples, or anecdotes.
- Appeal to common values such as fairness, compassion, teamwork, pride, or ambition.
- Use language that evokes specific emotions (hope, urgency, pride, empathy).

Example 1: "Imagine the pride we will feel knowing our company was instrumental in creating positive social change, transforming thousands of lives."

Example 2: "Imagine what it would feel like to walk into a room knowing that your hard work has helped hundreds of families find homes."

3. Logos (Logical appeal): Logos refers to persuasion through logical reasoning, factual evidence, and clear, structured arguments. It emphasizes rational thought, clarity, and objective analysis. In professional business settings, logic and evidence are often essential to persuade stakeholders who prioritize analytical rigor. Logos is most effective when supported by accurate data, factual evidence, and clear, logical reasoning.

Strategies to employ Logos:

- Clearly state your arguments and support them with credible data and evidence.
- Use structured reasoning—clearly organized points that logically lead the audience to your conclusion.
- Provide relevant examples, case studies, or statistics to validate your claims.

Example 1: "Our data clearly indicates that implementing this new marketing strategy can increase market share by 15% within the first year."

Example 2: "Our market analysis clearly indicates that investing in digital transformation can improve operational efficiency by approximately 30%, directly translating to substantial annual savings."

6.6 Elevator Pitch and Brief Professional Speeches

An elevator pitch is an informal term used for a brief, persuasive speech (typically 30–60 seconds long) designed to spark interest in your idea, product, or yourself as a professional. The term derives from the scenario of encountering someone important—such as a senior executive or investor—in an elevator, providing you only seconds to make a strong impression. The purpose of an elevator pitch is to generate immediate interest by highlighting the value and relevance of your concept, leaving a lasting impression. A well-crafted elevator pitch not only informs but also intrigues, paving the way for further discussions or opportunities to expand on your idea.

Components of an Effective Elevator Pitch: A compelling elevator pitch should be concise, focused, and engaging. It generally includes the following elements:

1. Introduction and Hook (Attention-grabber): Start with a warm, confident opening. Follow immediately with a compelling fact, question, or statement designed to grab attention. Example: “Hi, I am Ismat. I specialize in helping businesses enhance their investor funds. Did you know that over 80% of small businesses fail due to cash flow problems?”
2. Clear Value Proposition (Core message): Clearly explain the benefit, solution, or unique value of your idea or product. Answer the question, why should they care? Example: “Our mobile app helps small businesses predict and manage cash flows, significantly reducing financial uncertainty and boosting survival rates.”
3. Credibility (Briefly establish ethos): Quickly mention expertise or experience to build credibility. Example: “Developed by finance professionals with over 15 years of experience in corporate financial management...”
4. Call to Action (Next steps): End with a clear and concise request, suggesting the next step or inviting further discussion. Example: “I would love to meet soon and share how this solution can specifically help your business thrive. Are you available for a quick follow-up meeting this week?”

Beyond elevator pitches, brief professional speeches commonly occur when managers or leaders present ideas, make announcements, or respond concisely during meetings or conferences. These are short but impactful speeches. The goal is to share information clearly and leave a positive impression.

The basic elements of a professional speech are:

1. Clear Purpose: Clearly define the speech's intent: informing, persuading, motivating, or requesting specific actions.
2. Focused Content: Highlight only key points, presented clearly and concisely. Stay on track with your main point and don't give too many details that would overburden your audience.
3. Engaging Delivery: Maintain confident posture, eye contact, and appropriate pacing, emphasising clarity and professionalism.
4. Powerful Close: End memorably, clearly indicating your central message or desired outcome.

Common Scenarios for Brief Speeches:

- Introducing yourself: Use this when you are networking or in a team meeting. Say something like, "Good afternoon, everyone. My name is Ismat, and I really enjoy helping people learn how to talk to each other well. I have been working on public speech and audience engagement for the past year. I am happy to support this group with my skills."
- Presenting a new idea: Highlight the value and feasibility of your idea. Example: "I have an idea to improve our onboarding process by incorporating interactive training modules. Studies show these methods increase employee retention by 25%, and I believe it aligns perfectly with our goals."
- Congratulating or recognising others: Keep it thoughtful and genuine. Example: "I want to take a moment to recognise the team for their exceptional work on the recent project. Your dedication has set a new standard for excellence, and I am proud to be part of such an inspiring team."
- Closing a meeting: Summarise discussions and highlight key takeaways. Example: "Thank you for your time today. To recap, we have agreed on the next steps for the project, and I will follow up with detailed action items by tomorrow."

Common Mistakes to Avoid in Elevator Pitches and Brief Speeches

- Being too generic or unclear: Standing out and avoiding vagueness is essential. Clearly differentiate yourself or your proposal to avoid blending in with others. Avoid general statements like "I am hardworking" or "This idea will be successful." Instead, provide evidence, data, or examples like "I implemented a productivity system that increased efficiency by 20%."
- Overloading information: Keep your pitch concise and straightforward. Identify the one key takeaway you want your audience to remember. Start with that and build around it. Instead of cramming in every detail, leave room for curiosity. This not only shortens your pitch but invites engagement and dialogue.

- Failing to include a call to action: Clearly indicate the next steps or invite further conversation to maximise effectiveness. For example, instead of saying, "Let me know your thoughts," try, "Please share your feedback by Thursday."
- Lack of rehearsal: Practice regularly to speak confidently and fluidly under pressure.

6.7 Analysing and Critiquing Professional Speeches

The ability to analyse and critique speeches is vital for aspiring leaders and managers. Developing critical analysis skills helps you identify strengths and weaknesses in professional presentations, allowing you to enhance your communication strategies and mentor others effectively. It also helps in recognising common mistakes and pitfalls, enabling you to learn from them and refine your own communication skills. By analysing speeches with an objective viewpoint, you cultivate a mindset of continuous personal and professional improvement, empowering you to evolve as a speaker. Moreover, providing constructive feedback not only strengthens your ability to assess presentations but also enhances communication and collaboration within teams. This fosters better overall performance.

There are some key aspects by which one can analyse and critique professional speeches delivered by oneself as well as others.

1. Purpose and Clarity: Evaluate whether the speaker clearly identifies the speech's purpose and effectively communicates the intended message. The following are the questions to consider:
 - Was the purpose clearly stated from the start?
 - Were key messages or arguments well-defined and understandable?
2. Content and Structure: Analyse whether the speech has a logical and effective structure (introduction, body, conclusion).
 - Was the speech well-organized with a clear introduction, main body, and conclusion?
 - Did the speaker stay focused on the central message or purpose of the speech?
3. Credibility (Ethos): Assess how well the speaker establishes authority and trustworthiness. Questions to consider:
 - Did the speaker clearly demonstrate relevant expertise or experience?
 - Was the speaker perceived as trustworthy, confident, and authentic?

4. Emotional Appeal (Pathos): Evaluate how effectively the speech engages listeners emotionally. Questions to consider:
 - Did the speaker use stories, examples, or anecdotes to emotionally connect with the audience?
 - Did emotions align appropriately with the purpose of the speech and audience expectations?
5. Logical Appeal (Logos): Analyse the clarity and logical coherence of the arguments presented. Questions to consider:
 - Were arguments supported with credible evidence or data?
 - Did the speaker logically anticipate and address potential objections or questions?
6. Delivery Style and Technique: Critique the speaker's delivery, including voice modulation, pace, gestures, and body language. Questions to consider:
 - Did the speaker maintain confident and engaging body language?
 - Was the speaker's voice clear, varied, and effective in emphasizing important points?
 - Did the speaker maintain eye contact and effectively manage audience engagement?
7. Use of Visual Aids: Evaluate the effectiveness of any slides, charts, or visual aids used. Questions to consider:
 - Were visual aids clear, relevant, and supportive of the message?
 - Did visuals enhance the presentation without distracting the audience?
8. Time Management: Analyse the effectiveness of the speech by checking if it was completed within the given timeframe. Questions to consider:
 - Did the speaker stay within the allotted time?
 - Was the speech well-paced, neither rushed nor dragging?

Now that you have the toolbox to critique a professional speech, you will find it easy and convenient to analyse speeches in business environments. However, it is important to bear in mind that there are a few steps for conducting a critique to have an unprejudiced result:

1. Observe objectively: Listen to or watch the speech without preconceived notions. Pay attention to both what is said and how it is delivered.
2. Identify strengths: Highlight what the speaker did well. Was it their storytelling, confidence, use of visuals, or command over the subject?
3. Note weaknesses: Pinpoint areas where the speaker fell short. For instance, was there too much jargon, or did their body language appear stiff?

4. Provide constructive feedback: Offer suggestions for improvement in a way that is actionable and encouraging. For example, “You could improve audience engagement by using more eye contact and open gestures.”

6.8 Learning Outcomes

People who want to be leaders or managers need to be able to communicate clearly when they talk to others. This lesson stresses how important it is to have good speaking skills in order to explain your thoughts clearly, inspire your team, persuade others, and handle business communication situations well. In this unit, students learn how to give speeches that honour important events and accomplishments in the company, how to make presentations more clear and interesting, and how to use persuasive speaking to get different people to agree with them. Students also learn how to make short, powerful elevator pitches and professional talks that they can use for networking and in professional settings. Lastly, the unit gives students the analytical tools they need to give speeches honest feedback, which helps them keep improving their speaking skills.

6.9 Model Examination Questions

Objective Answer Type Questions

1. Effective oral communication is essential for _____ and _____ roles in the business world.
(Answer: leadership, management)
2. A _____ speech is delivered to honour milestones, achievements, or changes within an organization.
(Answer: commemorative)
3. The four key principles of effective presentations are clarity, _____, coherence, and confidence.
(Answer: conciseness)
4. In Aristotle’s rhetorical framework, _____ appeals to credibility, _____ to emotion, and _____ to logic.
(Answer: ethos, pathos, logos)
5. An _____ is a short, persuasive speech designed to generate interest quickly in a product, idea, or individual.
(Answer: elevator pitch)

6. A farewell or retirement speech often combines a professional tone with _____ and appreciation.
(Answer: warmth)
7. Verbal communication includes language, tone, pace, and _____.
(Answer: clarity)
8. Effective presenters analyse their _____ to tailor their message for maximum impact.
(Answer: audience)
9. One way to manage speaking anxiety is through _____ techniques, which involve imagining successful outcomes.
(Answer: visualization)
10. In speech critique, it is important to observe objectively, highlight strengths, and offer _____ feedback.
(Answer: constructive)

Short Answer Type Questions

1. Why are oral communication skills important for individuals aiming for leadership roles?
2. What are the key elements to include in a commemorative speech at a company anniversary?
3. Describe two verbal and two non-verbal communication strategies that improve presentation effectiveness.
4. How can a speaker analyse the audience to adapt the message effectively during a business presentation?
5. List the components of an effective elevator pitch. Give a brief example of one.
6. What is the role of 'pathos' in persuasive business speaking?
7. Explain how farewell speeches differ from award ceremony speeches in tone and content.
8. Mention three common mistakes to avoid in brief professional speeches.
9. Describe two ways to manage anxiety before delivering a speech or presentation.
10. Mention the steps in critiquing a professional speech.

Large Answer Type Questions

1. Explain in detail the different types of commemorative speeches used in business settings, providing examples for each.
2. Discuss the components of an effective elevator pitch. Why is it important in professional settings, and how can it lead to further opportunities?

3. Compare and contrast the three rhetorical appeals—ethos, pathos, and logos. Explain how each can be used effectively in persuasive business speaking.
4. Explain all the essential elements of critiquing a professional speech.
5. With examples, explain how verbal and non-verbal communication complement each other in delivering successful business presentations.

Unit 7-Negotiation

Structure

- 7.0 Introduction
- 7.1 Objectives
- 7.2 The Process of Negotiation
- 7.3 Approaches to Negotiation
- 7.4 Analytical Tools for Effective Negotiation
- 7.5 Power, Ethics, and Emotion in Negotiation
- 7.6 Common Negotiation Mistakes and How to Avoid Them
- 7.7 Real-World Business Negotiation Scenarios
- 7.8 Learning Outcomes
- 7.9 Model Examination Questions

7.0 Introduction

“Negotiation is a communication process in which two or more parties with differing views attempt to reach an agreement.” — Roger Fisher (1981)

Let us face it - negotiation is not just something that CEOs do in high-rise boardrooms. You are doing it all the time. From discussing project roles in a group assignment to landing that dream job, negotiation is a skill you already use, whether you realise it or not. But when you are in business, negotiations get trickier, more strategic, and have a lot more at stake. In today’s interconnected business world, your success relies on more than just what you know. It also depends on how well you can change outcomes, settle disagreements, and make deals. Indeed, that is what it means to negotiate.

Negotiation is a dialogue between two or more parties with the intention of reaching a mutual agreement. These people may have different goals, interests, or just different points of view. They try to find common ground, settle disagreements, divide up resources, and create value through bargaining. Interdependence, conflicts of interest, conversation, and making decisions are some of the key features of negotiation. Conflict is not a natural part of negotiation. The best negotiators are not the ones who try to “win” at all costs. Instead, they are the ones who understand everyone's needs, look for creative solutions, and make connections that last beyond the deal. Regardless of your MBA specialization, negotiation will become a daily function in your professional life. Since you are preparing for leadership roles across industries, your ability to negotiate effectively will influence the outcome, the relationship, and our long-term credibility as a professional.

Negotiation = Influence + Strategy + Communication

Negotiation is a necessary skill in business to get beneficial deals, contracts, and partnerships. If a business knows how to negotiate, it can get better deals and make more money. Businesses can make and maintain good business partnerships by making sure that deals are fair and good for everyone. It is easier to make choices when you can bargain well. People can make smart and fair decisions when they work together and see things from different angles. More people will be willing to work together and feel welcome. You can make relationships better through negotiation. It helps people be more open and trusting, which are both important for keeping friends over time. Negotiation gives people the strength to fight for what they want and need right now. This skill makes you more confident and bold, whether you are trying to get a raise, better working conditions, or to avoid losing your job. It helps people get their personal goals done and effectively express what they value. It also helps people from different cultures understand each other and work together from different parts of the world. To better understand these complexities, we illustrate concepts with negotiations drawn from contemporary Indian and global business practice in this unit.

7.1 Objectives

On completing the lesson, learners will be able to

- Understand the process and stages of negotiation
- Design a six-stage negotiation plan for any case at hand
- Select and justify the optimal negotiation approach
- Apply tools and techniques to real-world business contexts
- Avoid common pitfalls and handle ethical dilemmas in negotiation

7.2 The process of negotiation

Negotiation is a structured process that involves different stages which are followed to reach a mutually agreeable conclusion. The following are the steps or stages in the process of negotiation.

Fig 1: The stages or steps in the negotiation process

1. Preparation: The first step in any conversation is to get ready. That means figuring out what each side wants, what they care about most, and their goals. In this step, negotiators get important facts, find out what the other side wants, and state their own goals. To get ahead, they set clear goals and talk about possible agreements.
2. Opening the presentation: In this stage, both sides present their initial position. It means making their wants, needs, or plans clear. At this point, it is important to communicate clearly and listen carefully. The opening sets the tone for the meeting and gives people a place for further discussion.
3. Bargaining and discussion: This is the most important part of the negotiation process. Both sides discuss and make offers and counteroffers. They talk about possible solutions and try to find areas where they can agree. Effective negotiators use thinking, persuasion, and problem-solving to get what they want while still being fair.
4. Concessions and Compromises: Each side may have to give something up as the discussion goes on. The process involves changing demands or conditions to get closer to a deal that works for both sides. Making concessions should be planned and thought out so that no one gives up too much and the negotiations still move forward.

5. Agreement or settlement: When both sides agree on something, they make the deal official. At this stage, they write up a contract or write down the agreement's rules. It is important to be clear and precise so that there is no confusion later on. Before committing, both sides should carefully read over the terms.
6. Implementation and follow-up: After reaching a consensus, the next step involves implementing the agreed-upon measures. This means doing what was agreed upon and making sure everyone follows through.

Now that you have a fairly clear understanding of the negotiation process, you must be thinking that you can straight away dive into any negotiation that may come across your way. But pause here. Why? Read on.

Before any dialogue, ask: "What will I do if this talk collapses?" Just like any other task where you have a plan B in case the original plan fails, a business negotiation also requires a fallback plan. A Best Alternative to a Negotiated Agreement (BATNA) is the course of action you will pursue if the current negotiation fails to produce a deal that meets your minimum requirements. It is not your ideal outcome but it is your realistic fallback. Converting that fallback plan into a rupee (or time / quality) value sets your reservation price. The reservation price is the lowest price a seller is willing to accept or the highest price a buyer is willing to pay before walking away from the negotiation. Because it represents what you can achieve without the other side's cooperation, the strength of your BATNA determines how much leverage you carry at the table. It is the negotiator's safety net, compass, and most reliable source of power—all in one. Research the other party's likely BATNA as well; the gap between the two reservation prices defines the Zone of Possible Agreement (ZOPA), which we will discuss in the coming sections. Meanwhile, let us understand BATNA better with an illustration.

Example: A small business (buyer) is bargaining the price of steel in bulk. Its best option is a guaranteed quote from Seller No. 2 for ₹ 58 per kg, which includes freight and can be delivered in three weeks. Following this, the buyer starts talking with its chosen seller, Seller No 1. The buyer will go with Seller No. 2 if Seller No 1 can't match or beat the effective value of ₹ 58. Knowing this, the buyer boldly counters the first offer of ₹ 62 with ₹ 56 and better credit terms. Seller No. 1, aware of the competition, agrees to ₹ 57.50 and 30 days to pay, which is better for the buyer than the alternative and still makes money for the seller.

7.3 Approaches to negotiation

Approaches to bargaining are the different plans and strategies that two or more people use to come to an agreement. It means choosing the best way to talk, negotiate, and settle disagreements based on the goals and the situation. When negotiators use the right strategy, they can get fair results, build trust, and keep professional relationships strong. It also makes sure that everyone is satisfied with the deal, which lowers the chance of future disagreements. Using effective communication skills can help you solve problems and make better decisions. It also helps in having long-term business success. They help you deal with tough scenarios, understand other cultures, and act in an honest way. Here are the most common approaches to negotiation:

1. Competitive approach (I Win – You Lose): In the competitive style of negotiation, people put their own needs ahead of those of others because they have more power. This type of negotiation is based on the idea that the negotiating party wants to win. In this case, the person sees the discussion as a zero-sum game, where one side wins and the other side loses. Those who use this style are often direct, sure of themselves, and even hostile. To get what they want, they are ready to use methods like persuasion, pressure, or even threats. Competitive negotiators care more about short-term wins than long-term relationships. Their main goal is to get the most out of the deal for themselves, even if it means hurting the other person. This style can work well when you need to make a decision quickly, like in a court case, when bidding on a contract, or when negotiating a sale. But if you do it over and over, it can hurt relationships and make people less likely to trust you.
2. Accommodative approach (I Lose – You Win): A person who is ready to put the other person's needs and interests ahead of their own is said to be accommodating towards negotiation. People who use this style are willing to work with others, caring, and focused on keeping relationships harmonious. These people are willing to give up things to meet the needs of the other side. You can use this style when keeping the relationship strong is more important than winning the deal. But you should be very careful when you use this style. The problem with using this method too much is that it can make you feel bad in the long run. It may also lead to unmet needs or unbalanced agreements.
3. Avoidance approach (I Lose – You Lose): The Avoidance approach, which is also known as the "I Lose–You Lose" strategy, is a way to handle a problem where both sides decide not to work together to solve it. Instead of dealing with the problem, they pull away and delay taking action. Such behaviour makes things worse for everyone. In the workplace, this way of doing things can cause various problems, including less work getting done and relationships getting weaker over time. Avoidance may seem like a safe short-term solution, especially when things are not critical or are not very sensitive. But for issues requiring immediate attention, this approach becomes disastrous. As people who want to be managers and leaders in the future, you should know when avoiding something is counterproductive and learn how to use more helpful methods, such as working together or compromising, to find solutions that work for everyone.

4. Compromise approach (I lose / win some – You lose / win some): The compromise approach is a way to solve a problem where both sides give in to find a solution that works for everyone. That is why it is also called "I lose/win some – You lose/win some," Instead of trying to get everything they want, both sides give up some of what they want in order to find a middle ground. People often use this method when they don't have much time or when both people are equal and want to keep the friendship going. Compromise can help break a deadlock and keep the peace, but it may also produce less-than-ideal results because no one gets everything they want. It is important to know that balance is useful in many situations, but it shouldn't be used instead of more integrated solutions like working together to create long-term value.
5. Collaborative approach (I win – You win): The Collaborative approach, which is also called "I win–You win," is a way to solve conflicts that focuses on finding solutions that meet everyone's wants and interests. Collaboration doesn't mean giving in or avoiding problems. Collaboration actually means encouraging open conversation, mutual respect, and creative problem-solving so that everyone benefits. This method needs time, trust, and a readiness to see things from different points of view. It works best in tricky or important situations where keeping relationships healthy and increasing long-term value are very important.

Here is a list of some negotiation video clips, not from real scenarios, but from TV shows and movies so that you understand how negotiation works. Type in the prompt given below on YouTube and find relevant videos. You can turn on subtitles too.

- Search for "I would have done it for the experience" from the movie Just go with it. Here the characters discuss compensation for an acting job. The phrase highlights the idea of accepting an opportunity for personal growth rather than financial gain.
- Search for "The Michael Scott method of negotiation" from the show The Office. This scene showcases the character's unconventional approach to negotiation when they negotiate with the other side's executives to sell their struggling paper company. His tactics of rejecting the first offer outright, raising the stakes dramatically, and demanding more than just money are hilariously bold yet surprisingly effective.

- Search for “12 Angry Men jury deliberation scene” from the movie 12 Angry Men. This is a powerful negotiation sequence where one juror gradually influences the group by questioning assumptions, presenting logical arguments and appealing to reason rather than emotion. It is an excellent example of persuasion, reframing and consensus building in negotiation, showing how patience and structural thinking can shift even strongly opposing viewpoints.

What is your default negotiation style?

Now that you are familiar with the approaches to negotiation, you should be able to know your negotiation style. Here is a self-assessment mini-quiz of 10 forced-choice items. For each numbered pair, circle the option that you would probably choose in that situation. Try working quickly. Please note that there are no right answers.

S. No.	Situation	Option A	Option B
1	A teammate arrives late with missing data the night before a client pitch.	Push them to stay up and finish, even if it strains the relationship.	Offer to pick up their portion so the work gets done on time.
2	Two departments want the same slot on next week's leadership agenda.	Suggest sharing the slot: each gets 15 minutes.	Lobby hard; your project is more urgent.
3	You and a colleague disagree on design colours, but the launch is tomorrow.	Let them choose; you can revisit aesthetics next release.	Defer the decision until both of you have cooled off.
4	A supplier quotes above your budget but promises 24-hour delivery.	Negotiate a mid-price if they agree to 48-hour delivery.	Accept the higher price to secure delivery speed.
5	Your boss assigns you and a peer equal speaking time at a	Openly ask to present the whole demo; you know	Propose splitting the demo by modules to showcase

S. No.	Situation	Option A	Option B
	client demo.	the material best.	both strengths.
6	A friend keeps interrupting you in a study group.	Pause the meeting until they agree to ground rules.	Ignore it; finishing the assignment is more important.
7	Two teammates both want the same leadership role on a new project.	Volunteer to step aside if they resolve it quickly.	Facilitate a vote and accept whichever outcome emerges.
8	An inter-state partner insists on a lengthy approval chain.	Push for a tighter timeline backed by contractual penalties.	Suggest parallel work-streams so approvals can run in the background.
9	A vendor sends defective parts but denies fault.	Halt all payments until replacements arrive.	Offer to split the replacement cost to keep production moving.
10	Your senior asks you to join a project that overloads your schedule.	Politely decline and explain your current commitments.	Accept now; you can renegotiate deadlines later.

Scoring Key

Once you have your list of options circled, mark each A/B choice with the corresponding style letter given below.

- C = Competitive (I win/You lose) - Items 1A, 2B, 5A, 8A, 9A
- Ac = Accommodative (I lose/You win) - Items 1B, 4B, 6B, 10B
- Av = Avoiding (I lose/You lose) - Items 3B, 6B, 8B
- Cp = Compromising (I win-lose/You win-lose) - Items 2A, 4A, 5B, 7B, 9B
- Co = Collaborative (I win/You win) - Items 3A, 7A, 10A

Step 1: Count how many times each letter appears in your answers.

Step 2: Your highest score reveals your default negotiation approach as defined in the above section

Step 3: If the score is a tie, it means that you flex styles according to context. Note the two approaches and when you switch.

7.4 Analytical Tools for Effective Negotiation

The price is an important part of any negotiation, but modern negotiations do not hinge on price alone. There are more things that are just as important. Skilled negotiators use a small set of analytical ideas to find hidden gains, avoid cognitive traps, and come to deals that are both efficient (there is no more joint value to claim) and fair (everyone feels like they were treated fairly). There are five tools that are very helpful.

1. Zone of Possible Agreement (ZOPA): An unseen bandwidth is present in every negotiation, and it is bounded by the reservation value of each party. Any amount that falls within the band has the potential to satisfy both parties, hence a ZOPA is created whenever those two reservation prices overlap. In order to begin, you should first translate your own BATNA into a walk-away number, then estimate the equivalent of the opposing side, and lastly plot the overlap. In the event that the two ranges do not coincide, you should search for ways to broaden or shift the ZOPA (for example, by including warranty terms, extending the length of the contract, or offering performance bonuses) until an overlap is achieved. Let us understand it using an example.

Example: Imagine that you want to sell your old video game system, and a friend is interested. You and your friend both know what your limit is when you talk things over. The least amount of money you are ready to take for it is ₹1000, since you want to sell it rather than leave it lying around your house. It is usually based on your BATNA, which is the best thing you can do if you can't make a deal. If you don't get what you want, you could keep the console or sell it to someone else for ₹1000. In the same way, your friend has a limit on how much he will pay. He might not want to spend more than ₹1500 on your console. If he has to spend more than this, he would rather not buy your console or buy from someone else who agrees to this price. Because this is his BATNA, this ₹1500 is the amount of his reservation. You can make a deal at a number of different prices. Your friend is willing to buy for 1500 rupees or less, and you are willing to sell for 1000 rupees or more. It is a win-win situation when the price is between 1000 and 1500 rupees. The area where your acceptable selling price and his accepted buying price meet is known as the ZOPA. What if your lowest price to sell is higher than your friend's highest price to buy? Let us say you won't take less than ₹1600 and your friend won't pay more than ₹1500. There is no ZOPA. Sometimes, a smart mediator will try to find ways to close this gap. Instead of just focusing on the price, you could offer to give a game with the machine. This would make the deal more appealing to your friend and might even allow you to charge a little more. Your friend could also offer to pick it up, which would save you the trip and might make you more willing to lower your price. Adding these things to the discussion, like a warranty or a longer contract in a business deal, can effectively move or expand the ZOPA until an area of agreement appears, which lets both sides reach a result that is good for everyone.

2. Anchoring and Adjustment: In business deals, the way information is presented can significantly influence the final outcome. The concept that explains this phenomenon is "anchoring and adjustment". This principle describes our tendency to rely heavily on the first piece of information we receive and then make adjustments from that starting point. This first piece of information is called the 'anchor'. This number could be a salary, price or valuation which creates an anchor influencing the final agreement. Understanding this cognitive bias is crucial for anyone looking to improve their negotiation skills and decision-making abilities. Here are two examples of anchoring and adjustment to see how the first person who talks has an edge over the other party.

Example 1: A big company wants to buy a small startup that specialises in customer service solutions driven by AI. The startup is worth ₹50 crore, but the company that wants to buy it only offers ₹30 crore at first, which sets a low bar. Now that the anchor is at ₹30 crore, the startup makes a counter with ₹40 crore instead of saying ₹50 crore. Both sides negotiate and agree on ₹37 crore after several rounds of talks. This price is closer to the buyer's initial offer than to the seller's desired price. Even though changes were made, the first number brought up in the negotiation still has a big impact on the final deal. This shows how anchoring can set a psychological point of reference, which can change how people think and feel and help guide talks. Example 2: During a salary negotiation for a new job, Shamsuddin was asked about his expected salary. Instead of waiting for the employer to make the first offer, Shamsuddin confidently stated ₹12 lakh per annum, which was slightly above the industry average for the role. This high anchor set the tone for the negotiation. The employer countered with ₹11 lakh, which was still within Shamsuddin's acceptable range. After a brief discussion, they agreed on ₹11.5 lakh, which was higher than what Shamsuddin might have received if he had let the employer anchor the negotiation. By taking the initiative and setting the first anchor, Shamsuddin was able to steer the negotiation in his favour and secure a good deal.

3. Multi-issue packaging and logrolling: Multi-issue packaging and logrolling are ways to negotiate that help people come to an agreement by trading concessions or combining several problems into one. Multi-issue packaging means negotiating about more than one problem at the same time instead of one at a time. This gives you more freedom to make creative trade-offs. By letting one issue move in exchange for concessions on another, this method lets negotiators connect issues in a way that increases the number of ways that both sides can come to an agreement. On the other hand, logrolling is a type of multi-issue negotiation in which people trade support or concessions based on their goals, making sure that each side gives up something less important in order to get something more important.

Example: When a supplier and a retailer negotiate, the retailer may want lower prices and the supplier may want to sign a long-term deal. By logrolling, the supplier lowers prices and the store agrees to a longer deal. This makes everyone happy. Understanding each party's interests and willingness to make trade-offs is important for this approach to work. This encourages cooperation and improves collaboration. Logrolling and multi-issue packaging are both very helpful in business, political, and diplomatic talks because they help people come up with creative solutions, lower tensions, and make agreements that are stronger.

4. Pareto-optimal (efficient) trades: When no one can get ahead without hurting someone else, the trade is called Pareto-optimal or Pareto-efficient. In negotiation, a Pareto-optimal result makes sure that resources are used in a way that maximises overall efficiency. This means that once a trade reaches this point, it can't get any better without hurting one of the parties. When negotiating over more than one problem, this idea is very important because both sides want to make trade-offs that are best for both of them instead of settling for less-than-ideal solutions.

Example: Two businesses want to work together, but one wants help with marketing and the other wants lower costs. For this, a Pareto-optimal agreement would make sure that both get the most out of the deal without giving up any value. To reach Pareto optimality, people need to work together, make sure everyone knows what the priorities are, and be ready to try new trade-offs. In business negotiations, it is important to help both sides find answers that work well for everyone.

5. Negotiation analytics and scorecards: Scorecards and analytics for negotiations are powerful tools that are used to review, track, and improve the results of negotiations.

Negotiation analytics is the process of gathering and analysing data to make better negotiation strategies. Patterns, performance metrics, and predictive modelling help both sides make better choices. Negotiators can improve their strategies, figure out their strengths and flaws, and make themselves more effective by using information like past negotiation patterns, patterns of concessions, and benchmarks set by other negotiators. Scorecards, on the other hand, give you a structured way to evaluate negotiations by giving numbers to things like deal value, relationship effect, concessions made, and overall satisfaction. These scorecards help negotiators measure performance accurately, compare outcomes across negotiations, and make sure that they are in line with strategic goals. For example, companies can use scorecards to rate providers based on things like how flexible their prices are, how reliable their deliveries are, and how well they communicate. When negotiators use negotiation analytics and scorecards together, they can make choices based on data, get better results, and keep improving how they negotiate in the future.

7.5 Power, Ethics, and Emotion in Negotiation

Power, ethics, and emotion are the three most important things that affect negotiation. Power affects a negotiator's ability to change choices, which shifts the balance of power in a negotiation. Ethics are the moral compass of bargaining. They make sure that decisions are made in a fair, clear, and honest way. Emotions are crucial in relationships and have a big impact on trust, persuasion, and resolving conflicts. Figuring out how these things affect each other can help negotiators deal with problems in a way that balances strategic advantage with moral responsibility and emotional intelligence to get the best results.

Fig 2: Venn diagram of power, ethics and emotion

1. Power in Negotiation: Negotiators have a lot of control based on how much power they have. Positional power comes from authority or rank. This is why people higher up in the system have more negotiating power. Specialised knowledge gives someone expert power, and a negotiator's deep understanding of a subject can change the course of a negotiation. Relationship power comes from trust and partnerships. This lets negotiators maintain long-term relationships that make deals go more smoothly. Having resource power means having valuable things or chances that other people want, which gives negotiators a big edge. The strength of a negotiator's BATNA also has a big effect on their ability to negotiate. The stronger their alternatives, the better their situation.

Example: A seller talks with a big store chain about prices. The store has positional power because it has access to a huge group of customers. The supplier on the other hand, has material power because they offer a unique product that can't be found anywhere else. These forces need to be balanced during the discussion. If the retailer pushes too hard, the supplier may look for other partnerships, which would take away from the retailer's competitive edge.

2. Ethics in Negotiation: Ethics play a big role in negotiations because they affect trust, trustworthiness, and building relationships that last. Honest negotiators earn confidence by sharing important details openly. On the other hand, dishonest tactics may help in the short term but hurt reputations in the long term. Another important moral concept is fairness, which makes sure that agreements are fair and not unfairly take advantage of others. A lot of the time, negotiations involve moral dilemmas where choices have an impact on workers, customers, or society as a whole, and require careful ethical judgement. Cultural sensitivity is also very important because moral standards change from place to place, which affects how people talk to each other and how they negotiate. When companies put corporate social responsibility (CSR) first, they negotiate with ethical promises like fair labour practices and sustainability. This makes sure that business goals are in line with larger social values.

Example: During a business merger, a manager knows that the company's finances are worse than what the public knows. They are faced with an ethical dilemma: should they tell the acquiring company this information? If they lie, they might get a better deal, but it could hurt the company's image and get them in trouble with the law. Ethical bargaining builds trust and openness, which prioritises long-term success over short-term gain.

3. Emotion in Negotiation: Emotions change how people interact with each other and how choices are made. This has a big impact on how well negotiations shape. People can work together and solve problems more easily when they trust each other. These same people can act defensively when they are angry or frustrated making it harder to reach deals that work for everyone. Emotional intelligence (EQ) helps good negotiators keep their emotions in control and understand how other people are feeling. Thus, they can act in a smart way. It is also common for negotiators to show sadness or a sense of urgency on purpose in order to get the other party to give in. How people show their feelings during talks is also affected by their culture. Some cultures stress being open and honest about how they feel, while others teach on staying calm and in control.

Example: In a real estate discussion, both the buyer and the seller have strong feelings about the property. The seller has lived there for decades and is not readily agreeing to sell, even when fair offers are made. The buyer is aware of this emotional connection and uses empathy and reassurance to help the deal go smoothly. This makes the seller feel at ease with the change. Keeping your feelings in check makes it easier to come to an agreement.

7.6 Common Negotiation Mistakes and How to Avoid Them

Negotiation is a skill that needs careful planning, strategy, and the ability to understand how other people feel. But a lot of mediators make the same mistakes that can stop them from succeeding. Understanding these mistakes and how to avoid them can make the results of a negotiation much better.

1. Poor preparation: One big mistake is not being ready. Some negotiators start talks without fully understanding the wants, interests, or options of the other side. This leads to weak arguments and chances that are lost. Always find out important facts, know what the other side wants, and come up with a BATNA.
2. Arguing position instead of interests: A common mistake is focussing only on winning instead of finding an answer that works for everyone. Being competitive can hurt relationships and cause deals to fall through. Instead of competing, negotiators should work together to find solutions that meet the needs of all sides while still being fair.
3. Talking more than listening: Not listening is a BIG MISTAKE. Some negotiators focus on their own points of view instead of trying to understand what the other party is saying. When one side is not listening to the other, and repeatedly talking only about themselves, it makes negotiators irritated. By actively listening, asking clarifying questions, and showing empathy, you can find out about hidden interests and build trust.

4. Letting emotions take control: Another major error that is most often overlooked is allowing your emotions control over your life. While emotions are natural in negotiations, too much anxiety, irritation, or anger can make it difficult to make decisions and create forward plans. Negotiations benefit from emotional intelligence abilities that include calmness, neutral tone speaking, and awareness of the concerns of the other person.
5. Ignoring ethical considerations: Disregarding moral concerns is never a good idea as it can harm your reputation and trust. Using tricks, hiding important information, or making empty promises seems very tempting and rewarding in the short-run, but they can tarnish your image in the long run. Negotiating in an ethical way builds long-lasting relationships and guarantees long-term success.
6. Rushing to accept the first offer: People generally make the mistake of accepting the first offer too quickly. This can lead to missed opportunities and unfavourable terms. A lot of the time, the first offer from the other party is just an anchoring strategy that helps the other side more. If you accept too fast, it means you are eager, and might miss better offer that might have come out of the negotiation. It also lowers your power, since hesitating or making counteroffers can often lead to better terms. Also, acting too eager can make the other person wonder if they could have gotten a better deal, which can lead to new talks or questions about what is fair. To prevent this mistake, negotiators should carefully consider the proposal, weigh it against their BATNA, and plan how to respond in a way that gets better results without coming off as unwilling or hostile.
7. Failing to learn from past mistakes: Neglecting to learn from mistakes can cause many losses and missed chances in negotiations. Good negotiators look back at past discussions to see what they could have done better, like being better prepared, communicating better, or not noticing important points of leverage. When you don't think about past mistakes, you tend to make the same ones again, which can lead to bad deals and broken relationships. Skilled negotiators learn from their mistakes and use that information to change their strategies, improve their approaches, and come up with better tactics. Over time, better results, more trust, and better decisions are all guaranteed by constantly improving negotiation skills.

Let us see the negotiation mistakes and their preventic tactics at a glance in the table below.

S. No.	Mistake	Practical preventive tactic
1	Poor preparation	Use a one-page preparation canvas where you define goals, interests, BATNA, reservation value, and three probing questions for the other side.
2	Arguing position instead of interests	Reframe every stated demand with "because it allows us to ...". Then search for alternative ways to satisfy that underlying interest.
3	Talking more than listening	Adopt a 2-to-1 rule: for every minute you speak, listen for two. Take verbatim notes of at least one unmet need before responding.
4	Letting emotions take control	Build a pause phrase (For instance, "Let me reflect on that for a moment") into your script; step out or request a five-minute break when stress signals rise.
5	Igoring ethical considerations	Apply a newspaper test: would you defend this tactic if it appeared on tomorrow's front page? If not, redesign or disclose.
6	Rushing to accept the first offer	Always benchmark the first proposal against your quantified BATNA and at least two objective standards (market rates, precedents, expert appraisals).
7	Failing to learn from past mistakes	Keep a Negotiation Journal: record outcomes, concessions, and feelings within 24 hours. Also, review patterns monthly to adjust future strategy.

7.7 Real-World Business Negotiation Scenarios

Real-world business negotiation scenarios are actual situations where companies, governments, or individuals sit down to discuss terms and make important deals. These negotiations happen every day, which shape industries, economies, and even job opportunities. They are important because they involve real decisions that have impact on businesses and people. They can be about salaries, mergers, trade deals, or product pricing. Success depends on strategy, persuasion, and understanding the other party's needs.

Below are few real-world business negotiation scenarios.

1. Contract negotiation (supplier and buyer)

Contract negotiations between a supplier and a buyer occupy a unique space in the broader world of business bargaining because the agreement that emerges must simultaneously secure commercial value, allocate risk, and lay the groundwork for an ongoing operational relationship. Unlike one-off transactions, these negotiations translate directly into day-to-day coordination on pricing, delivery schedules, quality standards, payment timing, after-sales support, and, increasingly, data-sharing commitments or sustainability targets.

Example: A manufacturing company negotiates with a provider of raw materials. At first, the supplier gives a high price, but the manufacturer stresses that it can buy in bulk and offers a long-term relationship in exchange for lower prices. They finally come to an agreement on a contract that includes discounts for buying in bulk and flexible shipping times that are beneficial for both of them.

Case Study 1: Amazon vs Future Retail & Reliance (2020-24)

Future Retail decided to sell its most important assets to Reliance Retail for ₹24,700 crore as it was losing a lot of money because of the pandemic. But Amazon, which had invested in Future Retail through a partner agreement, stopped the sale by citing a clause in the agreement that said the deal couldn't happen without Amazon's permission. Amazon quickly went to the Singapore International Arbitration Centre (SIAC) to get help. They got an emergency court ruling that stopped the deal. Future Retail fought back in Indian courts, saying that Amazon didn't have direct control over its business decisions. Meanwhile, Reliance started taking over Future Retail's shops saying that they owed rent. In the end, the legal fight went on for too long, Future Retail went bankrupt, and its assets were sold at auction, ending its ability to run on its own. This case shows how important it is for buyers and sellers to negotiate contracts, since disagreements over stock agreements, asset transfers, and strategic investments can have a big effect on how a business runs and how the market is controlled.

Case Study 2: Starbucks and Kraft Coffee Conflict (2010)

A well-known real-life example of contract negotiation between a supplier and a buyer is the Starbucks-Kraft dispute. In 1998, Starbucks partnered with Kraft to distribute its packaged coffee in grocery stores. As the coffee business changed over time, Starbucks wanted to adapt to this. This was especially important as single-serve coffee pods became more popular. To go for this change meant to violate the contract. So, in 2010, Starbucks tried to get out of the deal by giving Kraft $750 million. Kraft was unhappy, which led to a court battle. After Kraft approached the court, Starbucks was told to pay Kraft $2.75 billion for breaking the deal. This case shows how important it is for suppliers and buyers to have open contracts and clear ways to get out of the deal. Starbucks and Kraft might not have had to go to court as much if they had included renegotiation or termination clauses in their original deal.

2. Mergers and Acquisitions (Corporate Deals)

Mergers and acquisitions (M&A) are high-stakes business negotiations where companies either combine (merger) or one company takes over another (acquisition). As discussed in the previous sections, price is only one part of these deals. The other considerations are valuation methods, payment mechanisms, legal permissions, cultural integration, and long-term strategy. Price fairness in M&A discussions is determined by financial models like discounted cash flow (DCF), market comparisons, and predicted future synergies. Another consideration is payment structure, which can be cash, stock, or a mix of both, often with performance-based incentives. The deal may require government permission, especially in antitrust-sensitive businesses. Beyond financial agreements, successful mergers require post-deal integration to blend business cultures, retain key workers, and align leadership. Integration planning errors can cause internal disagreements, productivity losses, and deal failures. Smart acquirers negotiate these issues rather than later. Alternative purchasers, acquisition targets, and timing control (regulatory clearances, financial contingencies, shareholder agreements) affect M&A negotiation leverage. Companies with strong alternatives or deadline control have more leverage to influence deal terms.

Example: Two medium-sized automobile manufacturers decide to merge to get a stronger market position and fight with bigger players in the same field. One company is an expert at making cheap cars that give more mileage, and the other is great at making high-end cars and electric cars. By joining forces, their strengths are brought together. This lets more types of cars to be manufactured by sharing technology and lowering the cost of production through economies of scale. Both sides negotiate about leadership structure, company identity, and supply chain integration while they are negotiating. They decide to keep both brands instead of eliminating any one. This way customers can choose between cheaper and more expensive cars. They also make things run more smoothly by sharing research and manufacturing sites, which makes them more efficient and profitable in the long run. Together, these two companies are better than they were separately because they can reach more customers, come up with new ideas, and save money.

Case Study 1: HDFC Ltd–HDFC Bank Mega-Merger (2023)

HDFC Ltd, India's biggest home finance company, and HDFC Bank, its sister bank, announced a huge all-stock merger in 2023. This would make them a 14-trillion-rupee financial powerhouse. Key regulators such as the Reserve Bank of India (RBI), the Securities and Exchange Board of India (SEBI), the Competition Commission of India (CCI), and foreign shareholders had to give their approval for this deal. This was done to make sure that the deal followed all legal and financial rules. One of the hardest things was combining two very different business cultures :HDFC Ltd.'s focus on lending to individuals and HDFC Bank's work as a general bank. This had to be done all the while keeping the two groups' efficiency and ability to work together. Also, the negotiators had to come up with a fair share-swap ratio to protect the interests of both groups of investors. This was done to make sure that owners from both companies kept their value as they joined the new company. This merger made HDFC Bank even stronger as a leading Indian bank by streamlining its operations, increasing its lending options, and making it more visible in the banking industry.

Case study 2: Facebook's acquisition of Instagram (2012)

In 2012, Facebook purchased Instagram for $1 billion. At first, this deal was seen by people as expensive for a company with no revenue at the time. But Facebook recognised Instagram's potential to dominate mobile photo-sharing and wanted to eliminate competition while integrating its features into its ecosystem. During the negotiation, Instagram's founders wanted to maintain independence and ensure their platform's vision remained intact. Facebook agreed to let Instagram operate as a separate brand while providing resources for growth. This approach helped smooth the transition and ensured Instagram's continued success under Facebook's ownership. This case highlights key negotiation elements: valuation, strategic alignment, and post-merger integration. Facebook's willingness to offer autonomy reassured Instagram's leadership, making the deal more attractive. Over time, Instagram became one of Facebook's most valuable assets, proving that well-structured negotiations can lead to long-term success.

3. Salary and job-offer negotiations

These are discussions between a job candidate and an employer about pay, benefits, and working conditions. The goal is to reach a fair agreement that works for both sides. A candidate should research industry pay standards, understand their value, and decide on the salary they want before negotiating. The employer considers their budget and how the candidate's skills fit the job. Besides salary, negotiations may include bonuses, health benefits, retirement plans, and flexible work arrangements. Good communication is key—candidates should confidently explain their skills and achievements, while employers outline expectations and company benefits. Emotional intelligence matters too—being polite and professional helps maintain a positive conversation. Thus, salary and job-offer negotiations help both sides find a balance, ensuring a fair deal while building a positive working relationship.

Example: An experienced marketing professional negotiating a job offer with a company. The employer offers a salary slightly below industry standards, but the candidate knows their skills and past achievements justify higher pay. Instead of accepting immediately, the candidate highlights their expertise in digital marketing, their successful campaigns, and their ability to increase brand engagement. They request a higher salary along with additional benefits like flexible working hours and professional development opportunities. After discussion, the employer agrees to a salary increase and adds extra paid leave days, creating a win-win agreement.

Case study 1: IIM-Ahmedabad vs. Flipkart (2016)

Flipkart hired 18 final-year MBAs from IIM-Ahmedabad with starting dates in early June 2016. The salary was said to be more than ₹20 lakh p.a. But in May, the company abruptly delayed the joining by six months, claiming “corporate restructuring”. Reports claimed that Flipkart was going through a difficult time. The company offered a one-time ₹1.5 lakh “bonus” to each recruit for the loss of six months. The placement officer at IIM-Ahmedabad wrote a strong letter to the management of Flipkart, rejecting the lump sum as “utterly unacceptable” and demanding full pay from June or a monthly stipend until they start working for the company. The institute said that if trust was lost, Flipkart could lose its first day of hiring at top business schools. (In the context of campus placements, the “first day of hiring” refers to the initial day when companies begin their recruitment process at an educational institution during the placement season. Companies visiting on the first day are often considered top-tier or highly desirable employers. Many students aim to secure a job on this day. This way, employers get to select the top talent of the institution.) Flipkart stuck to their December start date and the ₹1.5 lakh offer. Students now have to weigh the pros and cons and look for other choices in the meantime. This event is a classic example of BATNA leverage on both sides.

Case Study 2: Robert Iger’s return to Disney (2022)

Robert Iger’s tenure as CEO of Disney ended in 2021, and the company appointed his replacement. But the board of directors at Disney asked Iger to come back as CEO in 2022 because the company was having trouble with its strategy under the new CEO. Iger knew how valuable he was and how important it was to act quickly. So, he asked for a two-year deal worth $27 million a year that included salary, bonuses, and stock options. He negotiated in a smart way, using his past success at Disney and the need for stability in the company to get favourable terms. In high-stakes job negotiations, this case shows how important experience, timing, and leverage are.

4. Cross-cultural business negotiations

These involve discussions between parties from different cultural backgrounds, where differences in communication styles, business practices, and expectations can impact the negotiation process. These negotiations require an understanding of cultural norms, values, and decision-making approaches to ensure successful outcomes. For example, in Western cultures, negotiations often focus on direct communication, efficiency, and immediate decision-making. In contrast, Asian cultures, such as Japan, India or China, may emphasise relationship-building, hierarchy, and patience before finalising agreements. Similarly, Middle Eastern negotiations may involve extended discussions and hospitality as a sign of respect, while Latin American negotiations often prioritise personal connections and trust. Key challenges in cross-cultural negotiations include language barriers, differing expectations of formality, contrasting views on contracts, and variations in decision-making speed. Successful negotiators adapt by researching cultural backgrounds, showing respect for traditions, and using strategies like active listening, flexible communication, and relationship-building.

Example: An American technology company wants to form a partnership with a Japanese electronics manufacturer to co-develop a new product. The American team, accustomed to direct and fast-paced negotiations, presents their proposal with clear financial terms and deadlines, expecting a quick decision. However, the Japanese executives prioritise relationship-building before discussing business details. They prefer several meetings with informal conversations to establish trust before addressing formal agreements. Recognising the cultural difference, the American team adjust their approach, spending more time on small talk and demonstrating long-term commitment. Eventually, both sides reach an agreement that respects Japanese business customs while ensuring the American team's goals are met.

Case study 1: Tata Motors' Acquisition of Jaguar Land Rover (UK) (2008)

Tata Motors wanted to buy Jaguar Land Rover (JLR) from Ford for $2.3 billion, but the two companies had very different ideas about how to place the brand, how to pay workers, and how to conduct business in general. British unions were afraid of job cuts, and the media was full of talk about “colonial reversal”. Tata was then known in India for planning to launch the cheap Nano. They did not have the requisite knowledge about luxury cars. Ratan Tata, the chairman of Tata Sons, met with UK union leaders in person and promised that no plants would close for at least five years. This made people more accepting of change. Tata got access to global dealer networks and top-notch engineering skills as part of the final deal, which let JLR keep its independent British management and design teams.

Case study 2: Renault–Nissan Alliance (1999)

The Renault–Nissan Alliance, which took place in 1999, was a historic business deal that kept Nissan from going bankrupt and helped Renault grow globally. At the time, Nissan had $20 billion in debt and was losing market share. On the other hand, Renault wanted to grow its business outside of Europe. Instead of merging completely, the two companies worked out a strategic partnership. Renault bought 36.8% of Nissan’s shares and took on some of its debt in exchange for running the business. The negotiations were mostly about how to work together rather than who would own what. This way, both companies could keep their identities while sharing technology, production sites, and management know-how. Renault's leaders, especially Carlos Ghosn, were influential in reorganising Nissan and making the company more efficient. Careful culture adaptation and Ghosn's effort to learn Japanese were key to the alliance’s success. By showing respect for Nissan's company culture, Ghosn earned trust and cooperation, which made the integration go smoothly and led to long-term work together. The relationship worked out very well. Within a few years, Nissan became a profitable business, and the two companies formed one of the biggest auto partnerships in the world. This case shows some important ways to negotiate, such as using money to your advantage, finding a balance between power and independence, and focusing on long-term collaboration over short-term gains.

5. Crisis Negotiations (Conflict Resolution)

Crisis negotiations, also known as conflict resolution negotiations, involve high-pressure discussions to resolve urgent disputes, prevent harm, or manage difficult situations. These negotiations often take place in business, legal disputes, diplomatic relations, or emergency situations, requiring clear communication, strategic problem-solving, and emotional intelligence. In business, crisis negotiations can arise from stakeholder disputes, financial struggles, regulatory challenges, or damaged reputations. Companies facing a public relations crisis, for example, must negotiate with media, customers, and investors to restore trust. In labor conflicts, management and employees negotiate solutions to prevent strikes or workforce disruptions. Legal disputes, such as contract disagreements, require negotiations to avoid lengthy court battles and reach settlements. Successful crisis negotiators prioritise de-escalation, active listening, and mutual understanding. They focus on finding common ground, offering compromises, and maintaining calm despite pressure. Skilled negotiators also anticipate worst-case scenarios and prepare alternative solutions to navigate intense situations effectively.

Example: Imagine a smartphone manufacturer discovering that one of its latest models has a battery defect that could cause overheating. Customers begin complaining online, and regulatory agencies demand action. Instead of denying the issue, the company's leadership negotiates with suppliers to quickly replace faulty batteries, works with government regulators to ensure compliance, and communicates transparently with consumers through public statements and compensation offers. By acting swiftly and negotiating with multiple stakeholders—including suppliers, government officials, and customers—the company minimises damage, regains trust, and prevents long-term reputational harm.

Case study 1: Maruti Suzuki Manesar labour unrest (2012)

The Maruti Suzuki Manesar (Haryana) labour unrest was one of the most violent labour disputes in India's automotive industry. It ended with the tragic death of a top HR executive, and a lot of property damage. Long-standing disagreements between management and workers led to the unrest. These disagreements were mostly about working conditions, pay, and how contract workers were treated. An employee was suspended, and the contract workers union was demanding that he be reinstated. A problem with an employee's punishment turned into a full-on riot very soon. Workers attacked executives and set fire to plant buildings, injuring nearly 100 officials. Because of what happened, the Manesar plant was shut down, many employees were arrested, and hundreds of workers were fired. The violence brought to light long-standing problems in labour relations, such as the growing dependence on contract workers and the lack of communication between bosses and workers. During the court proceedings, 31 workers were found guilty, including 13 of murder. The case made it clear that India's manufacturing sector needs better communication, fair labour standards, and proactive ways to settle disagreements.

Case study 2: Boeing's 737 MAX Crisis

In 2018 and 2019, two deadly crashes involving Boeing's 737 MAX planes caused the fleet to be grounded around the world. Some automatic systems (MCAS) were not working right, and pilots were not properly trained to deal with them. This was the major cause of the crashes. Boeing faced backlash from regulators, airlines, and the public, leading to financial losses and reputational damage. To manage the crisis, Boeing had to negotiate with government regulators, airline customers, and victims' families. The company worked with the Federal Aviation Administration and international aviation authorities to develop software fixes and improve pilot training so that the aircraft met updated safety standards. Boeing also negotiated compensation packages with airlines that had purchased the 737 MAX but were unable to use due to the grounding. These measures helped in reducing financial losses for affected companies. In addition to this, Boeing engaged in crisis communication efforts, issuing public apologies and pledging transparency in its safety improvements to rebuild consumer confidence. Through technical fixes, regulatory cooperation, and financial settlements, Boeing gradually restored trust in the 737 MAX, which was cleared to fly again in 2020. This case highlights the importance of swift crisis response, transparent communication, and effective negotiation with multiple stakeholders to manage conflicts and protect brand integrity.

You will see more about crisis resolution in Unit 9.

7.8 Learning Outcomes

Negotiation is a purposeful communication process in which interdependent parties work through differing interests to secure value, resolve conflict, and build durable relationships. As today's business environment grows more interconnected and high-stakes, mastery of negotiation equips managers to shape outcomes ethically and strategically. The unit discussed the six-stage negotiation process of preparation, opening presentations, bargaining, making concessions, agreement, and follow-up. It showed how each stage demands clear objectives, active listening, and disciplined planning to protect one's Best Alternative to a Negotiated Agreement (BATNA). It then compared five common approaches—competitive, accommodative, avoidance, compromise, and collaborative—highlighting when each style helps or harms long-term value creation.

Power, ethics, and emotion overlay every deal. Understanding sources of power (position, expertise, resources, relationships), adhering to transparent and fair practices, and managing emotions through emotional intelligence allow negotiators to pursue advantage without sacrificing credibility. The lesson also flagged seven frequent pitfalls—from poor preparation and positional arguing to ethical missteps and rushing the first offer—and offered practical antidotes. Finally, ten real-world scenarios (supplier–buyer contracts, mergers and acquisitions, salary negotiations, cross-cultural deals, and crisis resolution) demonstrated how sound strategy and cultural awareness translate theory into business success. By internalising these concepts and reflecting on personal style, learners leave the unit ready to negotiate outcomes that are not only economically sound but also ethically robust and relationship-positive.

7.9 Model Examination Questions

Objective Answer Type Questions

- Which element best defines a "strong BATNA"?
 - High emotional commitment
 - Superior fallback value
 - Shared interests
 - First offer made
- Anchoring bias is most effectively countered by
 - Mirroring body language
 - Generous concessions
 - Objective external standards
 - Silence
- When a negotiator uses transparent disclosure and benefits the other side's high-priority issue, the tactic is called
 - Bluffing
 - Logrolling
 - Forcing
 - Avoidance
- In the collaborative style of negotiation, the primary goal is to
 - Maximise individual gain
 - Split the difference
 - Strain relationships
 - Expand joint value
- Rushing to accept the first offer is risky mainly because
 - It shows desperation
 - It violates ethics
 - It delays agreement
 - It increases preparation time

Short Answer Type Questions

- Explain the Zone of Possible Agreement (ZOPA).
- Describe the main characteristics of the collaborative (win-win) approach.
- What can emotional intelligence (EQ) do to help break a deadlock in negotiations caused by anger or frustration?
- What is a negotiation scorecard? Discuss its benefits.
- Define BATNA. Explain why quantifying it is essential before entering negotiations.

Long Answer Type Questions

1. Describe the six stages in the negotiation process.
2. Compare and contrast the five approaches to negotiation (competitive, accommodative, avoidance, compromise, and collaborative).
3. Critically analyse the role of power, ethics, and emotion in the 2016 Flipkart–IIM-Ahmedabad deferred-joining controversy.
4. Analyse the interplay of power, ethics, and emotion in negotiation.
5. Identify the seven common negotiation mistakes and propose one preventive tactic for each.

Unit 8-Interviews

Structure

- 8.0 Introduction
- 8.1 Objectives
- 8.2 Concept of Interview
- 8.3 Requisites and Techniques
- 8.4 Typology of Interviews
- 8.5 Types of Interviews
- 8.6 Effective Interview
- 8.7 Learning Outcomes
- 8.8 Model Examination Questions

8.0 Introduction

Interviews are structured conversations designed to achieve a specific outcome through direct interaction. In business and management, interviews are an important tool that can be used for many things. One main use for them is in hiring and picking people, where they help figure out if a candidate is a good fit beyond what is clear from their resume or application. Interviews allow employers to assess both professional competencies and soft skills, including cultural fit and problem-solving abilities. Performance review interviews are also important for employee growth because they give you a structured way to discuss problems, review accomplishments, and set goals for the future. These interactions make sure that workers get constructive feedback and are motivated, which increases their work output and helps them grow professionally.

Interviews are an important part of market research because they help companies figure out what customers want, need, and are having trouble with. Companies can learn a lot about their customers through structured or semi-structured talks that quantitative methods like surveys might miss. Businesses can use this qualitative data to improve their goods, customer service, and marketing strategies. In the same way, interviews with stakeholders, experts, and industry leaders are very helpful for strategy planning because they help get detailed information from them. These talks give businesses a bigger picture of market trends, how they compare to additional information about answers, and dig deeper into thoughts and opinions in real time. For example, Selection interviews assess both technical expertise and interpersonal skills, including adaptability and alignment with company values. Exit interviews, on the other hand, give employers important information about why employees are leaving, problems with the workplace culture, and the reasons behind turnover. This helps them come up with good strategies to keep employees. Additionally, customer interviews can reveal unmet needs or emerging trends, enabling businesses to gain a competitive edge. Overall, interviews are still a great way for businesses to make choices based on facts and data while still putting people first.

8.1 Objectives

On completing the unit, you will be able to:

- Define “interviews” and explain their importance in business and management.
- Identify and differentiate between various types and formats of interviews.
- Understand key requisites and techniques for conducting effective interviews.
- Apply best practices as both an interviewer and an interviewee.
- Use interview insights to support business and management strategies.

8.2 Concept of Interview

As discussed above, interviews are an important part of business and management for many reasons, such as hiring, evaluating performance, and researching the market. Of these, the most popular use is hiring. Interviews help employers figure out not only a candidate's technical skills but also how well they can communicate, solve problems, and fit in with the organisation's culture. Interviews are more dynamic than resumes or application forms, and they give companies a chance to see how confident, flexible, and talented a candidate really is. Interviews are also necessary for evaluating employees because they allow people to discuss their past work, figure out their strengths and weaknesses, and set job goals for the future.

Interviews are an important part of business because they provide companies useful information that helps them deal with problems, make their business plans better, and run their operations more smoothly. When businesses do interviews right, they don't just look at numbers; they also look at qualitative information that can affect their long-term success.

There are certain things about interviews that make them very useful in business settings. Every interview is purpose-driven, which means it has a clear reason, like finding the best candidate, learning about employee concerns, or finding out what customers want. It is also interactive, so you can ask questions, get additional information, and have a better conversation right away. It is important to be well-prepared, which means learning about the person you are interviewing, making sure your questions are relevant, and keeping a professional but friendly tone. Interviews are important because they can show things that raw data can't, like how motivated employees are, how likely they are to be good leaders, or how customers feel, which helps businesses make well-rounded and strategic decisions.

8.3 Requisites and Techniques

To conduct a good interview, you need to make sure you meet some important requirements for a smooth and productive exchange. One of the most important things to do is make clear goals. There should be a reason for every interview, like checking out a candidate's skills, getting customer feedback, or judging a worker's work. It is also very important to prepare well. To do this, you should research the person you are interviewing, look at important papers like old performance reviews or resumes, and think of good questions to ask them. Preparing for an interview helps the person doing it stay on task and think of good questions to ask. The interview setting is also very important to how well the talk goes. It is best for everyone if the space is comfortable, quiet, and free of other things that could get in the way of their work or talks.

To do better in interviews, you should also be able to actively listen. To fully understand what someone is saying, you need to pay close attention to their tone of voice, facial emotions, and body language, as well as what they say. They should also learn how to take notes, which will help them remember important things and make sure that choices and assessments are correct. When more than one reviewer looks at the same candidate at different times during the hiring process, it can be very helpful to keep your notes in order. Being professional while making everyone feel at ease is also important for honest and open conversation. The person being interviewed should feel at ease. If they do, they are more likely to give honest answers instead of ones they have planned or are hiding.

There are many good ways to make the interview process better. One way to do this is to plan ahead and ask different kinds of questions. When asked, "Can you describe a difficult project you led?" people are more likely to give a detailed answer than when asked, "Did you meet the project deadline?" or something similar. We can learn more about important things by asking questions like "Can you explain that further?"

Making friends is another important skill. Being friendly and professional at the start of a talk can help people feel more open and trusting. A good way to keep the talk on track is to set clear times for introductions, major questions, and closing comments.

Finally, it is important to be flexible. They should be able to change how they do things based on what the person says and ask more questions if they need to. These standards and methods can help you do interviews well and reach your goal, whether you are hiring someone, judging their work, or doing research for your business.

8.4 Typology of Interviews

Interviews can be put into groups based on how they are structured, which affects how controlled and consistent the questions are. Structured interviews use a set of predetermined questions to make sure that all of the answers are the same. This makes it easy to compare results. These are often used to keep things fair and get rid of bias during the hiring and choosing process. Structured interviews are highly effective for high-stakes hiring, ensuring fairness and compliance by presenting identical questions to all candidates. When it comes to interviews, semi-structured ones are a good mix of order and flexibility. They have a general structure, but the answers let the reporter dig deeper into certain areas based on what the person says. This kind is often used in performance reviews, where a mix of standard and open-ended questions helps figure out what an employee does well, what they could do better, and what they need to learn. Unstructured interviews are the most adaptable because they are more like a chat and don't have a set of questions that must be asked. These are especially helpful for exploratory study, where the goal is to get some initial ideas without getting in the way of the conversation. They are often used to find new ideas or understand new trends in business meetings, journalistic reporting, and qualitative research.

Another way to classify interviews is by how many people are involved, since the number of people affects how the interviews flow and how in-depth the conversations are. Individual interviews are great for cases that need detailed, individualized evaluations because they only involve one interviewer and one interviewee. These are often used for hiring, professional coaching, and private conversations because they offer a quiet, focused space for in-depth analysis. Individual interviews are the best way to find out about a job candidate's attitude, skills, and cultural fit with the company. In group interviews, on the other hand, one or more interviewers evaluate more than one person at the same time. These are often used in market research focus groups, where companies want to find out what customers think, test out new goods, or get different points of view on branding and marketing strategies. Group interviews are also used when there are a lot of people to hire, like when someone needs to be hired for a customer service or sales job where they need to work together and communicate well.

Understanding the different types of interviews can help you choose the best approach for your goal. For instance, structured interviews are better for hiring because they follow the law and give a fair evaluation, while semi-structured interviews are better for judging employee success because they allow for some flexibility. In the same way, group interviews are good for quickly getting a lot of different points of view, while one-on-one questions give you more personal information. The type of interview has a big effect on the quality of the data gathered, how quickly the process goes, and how well business or research goals are met overall. Companies can make sure that interviews are useful and lead to good decisions by carefully choosing the right interview type.

8.5 Types of Interviews

Specific types of interviews are being discussed in the following:

Selection interviews: As part of the hiring process, selection interviews are used to find out about a candidate's skills, experience, and general fit for the job. There are different kinds of these interviews, such as initial screenings, in-depth competency-based interviews, or discussions about making the final choice. For instance, a candidate's basic skills and interest in the job might be checked out over the phone as a first step before they are invited to a face-to-face or video interview. To find out how well a candidate can solve problems and get along with others, in-depth interviews often include behavioural and situational questions, like "Can you describe a time when you handled a difficult project?" For leadership positions, it is normal for the same candidate to be interviewed by more than one person. This makes sure that the evaluation is fair and well-rounded. Companies can find the best employees and make sure hiring choices are fair and consistent by setting up the selection process well.

Appraisal interviews: Periodically, usually once or twice a year, an employee's performance is reviewed, goals are set for the future, and professional issues like recognising successes, dealing with problems, and setting standards are talked over. A well-run performance review interview encourages employees to talk about company goals and open communication between workers. Structured parts, like going over key performance indicators (KPIs), make sure that everything is the same. However, the interview is usually only partly structured, so there is time to talk about career goals, skill development, and job happiness. Managers can use these talks to find out what training employees need, who might be promoted, or how they can improve their performance. This way, they can make sure that employees get the help they need to move up in the company. When appraisal interviews are done right, they help keep employees and make the workplace more productive generally.

Exit interviews: These interviews help companies figure out why employees leave, what problems are happening at work, and where policies, culture, or leadership could be better. Structured exit interviews make sure that all important topics are covered in a planned way, including job satisfaction, work environment, management effectiveness, and ideas for improvement. For instance, workers who are leaving could be asked "What could have been done differently to keep you?" or "Did you feel supported enough in your role?" Honest feedback from exit interviews can help companies improve their ways of keeping employees, make the workplace a better place to work, and stop more people from leaving. Companies can make the workplace better for current and future workers by acting on the information they get from exit interviews.

Research interviews: People are interviewed for research purposes in order to get qualitative data for things like market research, customer feedback studies, and business research. Businesses use these talks to learn about what customers want, how the market is changing, how happy their employees are, and how their competitors are doing. Research interviews are usually not structured or only partially structured, unlike structured interviews used for jobs. This lets interviewers go into more detail about topics without being limited in any way. For instance, a company releasing a new product might talk to focus groups to find out how people feel about it, what they like about it, and what they think could be done better. In a business setting, study interviews can be used to find out how happy employees are or what the culture of the workplace is like. Research interviews are important for making data-driven business decisions and improving goods, services, or policies based on real user experiences because they get rich, detailed answers.

Telephone Interviews: A lot of people use phone talks to get to know potential employees before they meet them in person, to do surveys from afar, or to get quick feedback when they can't meet in person. They are especially helpful when hiring people and there are a lot of applicants that need to be quickly evaluated. For example, recruiters might do short, structured phone interviews with candidates to make sure they are qualified, know what pay they want, and are available before asking them to a formal interview in person or online. Businesses can quickly reach a large group of people through telephone interviews, which is useful for market research like polls or finding out how happy customers are with a service. Because there are no visible cues, clear speech, active listening, and strong verbal engagement skills are needed to make sure that everyone understands and is interested in the conversation.

Video Interviews: As more people work from home and hire people from around the world, video chats are being used more and more for job interviews, teamwork, and business talks. When done through platforms like Zoom, Microsoft Teams, or Google Meet, online interviews help people from different places talk to each other without having to travel, but they still have all the benefits of talking to someone in person. Video interviews are used by employers to test candidates live or even with pre-recorded answers, so they can answer set questions whenever they want. To make a good impression, you need a stable internet link, good lighting, clear audio, and to dress professionally for video interviews. Both the interviewer and the person being interviewed should pay attention to body language, eye contact, and interest, just like they would in person. Companies can find and hire more talented people around the world and speed up business and hiring processes by using video interviews well.

Each type of interview is used for a different reason and meets a different business need, such as hiring people and judging their performance or doing study and making it easier for people to talk to each other from far away. Making the right choice about the type of interview helps companies reach their goals quickly and correctly.

Comparison of Interview Types

Type	Purpose	Structure	Example Use Case
Selection Interview	Assess candidate suitability	Structured/Semi-structured	Hiring for a managerial role
Appraisal Interview	Review performance, set goals	Semi-structured	Annual employee review
Exit Interview	Understand departure reasons	Structured	Employee leaving the organization
Research Interview	Gather qualitative data	Unstructured	Market research on customer preferences
Telephone Interview	Initial screening	Structured	First contact with remote candidates

Type	Purpose	Structure	Example Use Case
Video Interview	Remote assessment	Structured/Semi-structured	Final interview for global teams

8.6 Effective Interview

Both the interviewer and the person being interviewed need to follow best practices to make sure the conversation is useful and professional. For interviewers, it is important to be well-prepared. This means knowing why the interview is happening, learning about the person being interviewed, and coming up with good questions to ask them. For instance, if someone is being interviewed for the job of business manager, they should come up with questions that test their ability to lead, solve problems, and think strategically. Additionally, making the interviewees feel at ease is important for letting them freely express themselves. This means that interviews should be held in a place that is quiet and free of distractions, and they should start with a friendly welcome to help the candidate feel at ease. Active attention is an important part of a good interview because it helps the interviewer fully understand what the candidate is saying. Engaging body language, like keeping eye contact and nodding, along with follow-up questions like "Can you give an example?", get interviewees to talk more about their experiences, which gives you a better idea of what they can do.

For interviewees, doing the right study and getting ready have a big effect on how well they do. To show that they are interested during the interview, candidates should learn about the company's purpose, products, industry trends, and new developments. You can learn a lot from sites like Indeed.com, Glassdoor, and the main page for the company. Answering common job questions like "Why do you want to work here?" over and over again can help you feel more confident and make sure your answers fit with the company's goals. It is also important to participate in the conversation. A candidate should not only answer questions, but also ask insightful ones, like "What are the biggest problems the team is facing right now?" to show enthusiasm and initiative. The STAR method (Situation, Task, Action, Result) provides a structured approach for articulating past experiences effectively. Someone can say something like, "I led a marketing campaign that increased customer engagement by 30%, which led to a 20% increase in sales," instead of, "I successfully led a project." This method makes reactions stronger and easier to measure.

People being interviewing and people being interviewed should both be aware of typical mistakes that can make the interview less useful. Interviewers shouldn't ask biased questions like "Are you married?" or "How old are you?" because these questions can lead to legal problems and claims of discrimination. To be polite, they should also make sure to follow up with candidates about the next steps. Interviewees should avoid bad body language, like crossing their arms or not making eye contact, which can make them look like they are not interested. If they ask unrelated questions, don't do research on the company, or don't send a follow-up email within 24 hours, it can hurt their chances of getting hired. A well-written thank-you email makes the person interested in the job even more and makes a good impact. Both the interviewee and the interviewer can get the most out of the process by following these best practices. This will lead to better hiring decisions and career options.

Do's: Best practices for a successful interview

1. Research the Company – Learn about the company's mission, products, services, culture, and industry trends to demonstrate genuine interest.
2. Understand the Job Role – Carefully read the job description and align your answers with the required skills and responsibilities.
3. Prepare Common Interview Answers – Practice responses to questions like "Tell me about yourself", "Why do you want this job?", and "What are your strengths and weaknesses?"
4. Use the STAR Method – Structure responses using Situation, Task, Action, and Result to give clear, detailed answers.
5. Dress Professionally – Wear appropriate business attire that matches the company's work culture.
6. Be Punctual – Arrive at least 10-15 minutes early for in-person interviews or log in on time for virtual interviews.
7. Bring Necessary Documents – Carry extra copies of your resume, reference letters, certifications, and a notepad for taking notes.
8. Maintain Good Body Language – Sit upright, maintain eye contact, use hand gestures appropriately, and nod to show engagement.
9. Listen Actively – Pay attention to the interviewer's questions and respond thoughtfully. Avoid interrupting.
10. Show Enthusiasm and Confidence – Speak clearly and with energy. Express your passion for the role and the company.

11. Ask Insightful Questions – Inquire about team dynamics, growth opportunities, and company goals, such as "What are the biggest challenges your team is currently facing?"
12. Be Honest – Provide truthful responses, even when discussing weaknesses or challenges. Employers appreciate authenticity.
13. Follow Up After the Interview – Send a thank-you email within 24 hours, expressing gratitude and reiterating your interest in the role.
14. Practice for Virtual Interviews – Check your internet connection, lighting, audio, and background before a video interview.
15. Stay Calm Under Pressure – If you receive a challenging or unexpected question, take a moment to think before answering.

Don'ts: Common Mistakes to Avoid

1. Lack of Preparation – Going to an interview without researching the company or practicing common questions can result in poor performance.
2. Arriving Late – Being late shows poor time management. Always plan ahead and leave early to accommodate unexpected delays.
3. Dressing Inappropriately – Avoid casual or overly flashy attire unless the company culture is informal.
4. Speaking Negatively About Past Employers – Criticizing previous jobs or bosses can make you appear unprofessional and untrustworthy.
5. Giving Vague or One-Word Answers – Provide detailed, structured responses instead of simple "yes" or "no" answers.
6. Failing to Make Eye Contact – Lack of eye contact can make you seem disinterested or lacking confidence.
7. Over-Talking or Interrupting – Give concise answers and allow the interviewer to guide the conversation.
8. Poor Body Language – Avoid crossing arms, slouching, or fidgeting, as these can convey nervousness or disinterest.
9. Using Filler Words Excessively – Avoid saying “like,” or “you know” or “um”, “uh” too frequently. Practice speaking clearly.
10. Not Asking Questions – Failing to ask the interviewer anything can make it seem like you are not truly interested in the position.
11. Lying About Skills or Experience – Employers can verify information, and dishonesty may lead to disqualification.

12. Forgetting to Follow Up – Neglecting to send a thank-you email can make you seem indifferent about the opportunity.
13. Not Managing Virtual Interview Settings – A poor internet connection, background noise, or bad lighting can create a negative impression.
14. Bringing Up Salary Too Soon – Wait until the interviewer discusses compensation, unless asked directly about salary expectations.
15. Appearing Desperate – While enthusiasm is good, sounding too desperate for the job may weaken your bargaining position.

By following these do's and avoiding these don'ts, candidates can present themselves as well-prepared, confident, and professional, maximizing their chances of success in interviews.

8.7 Learning Outcomes

Interviews serve as vital tools in business and management, playing key roles in hiring, performance assessment, market research, and strategic decision-making. They provide insights beyond resumes or data, allowing employers to evaluate both technical skills and soft skills, including adaptability and cultural fit.

Different types of interviews cater to specific business needs—selection interviews assess job candidates, appraisal interviews review employee performance, exit interviews uncover reasons behind turnover, and research interviews gather qualitative insights for market and operational strategies. The typology of interviews includes structured, semi-structured, and unstructured formats, each varying in flexibility and consistency. Additionally, interviews differ based on the number of participants, such as individual interviews for focused evaluations and group interviews for diverse perspectives.

Effective interviewing hinges on clear objectives, thorough preparation, active listening, and professional engagement. Both interviewers and interviewees must apply best practices to ensure meaningful interactions. The STAR method (Situation, Task, Action, Result) aids candidates in structuring responses, while rapport-building, strategic questioning, and post-interview follow-ups enhance overall effectiveness.

With technological advancements, telephone and video interviews have become essential for remote hiring and global collaboration. Structured approaches and interactive elements ensure successful outcomes, making interviews fundamental in shaping informed business decisions and fostering workplace efficiency.

8.8 Model Examination Questions

Multiple Choice Questions (MCQs)

1. What is the primary purpose of an interview in business and management?
 - A. To have a casual conversation
 - B. To gather information and assess suitability
 - C. To entertain employees
 - D. To avoid formal hiring processes
2. Which type of interview follows a predefined set of questions for consistency?
 - A. Unstructured Interview
 - B. Semi-structured Interview
 - C. Structured Interview
 - D. Group Interview
3. What is an exit interview primarily used for?
 - A. Understanding the reasons for an employee's departure
 - B. Evaluating an employee's performance
 - C. Selecting a candidate for a job role
 - D. Conducting market research
4. Which of the following is NOT a characteristic of an effective interview?
 - A. Purpose-driven
 - B. Interactive
 - C. Well-planned
 - D. Unprepared
5. What is a panel interview?
 - A. An interview conducted by multiple candidates together
 - B. An interview conducted by multiple candidates together
 - C. A phone-based interview
 - D. A casual conversation between employees
6. Which interview technique involves structuring responses into Situation, Task, Action, and Result?
 - A. STAR Method
 - B. SWOT Analysis
 - C. SPIN Selling
 - D. Pareto Principle
7. What should an interviewer avoid to ensure fairness in selection interviews?
 - A. Inquiring about marital status or age
 - B. Asking about leadership skills
 - C. Conducting behavioural assessments
 - D. Using structured questions
8. A semi-structured interview allows for

- A. No pre-planned questions at all
 - B. A combination of set questions and flexibility
 - C. Only close-ended questions
 - D. Completely scripted answers
9. What is the main advantage of a video interview?
- A. It eliminates the need for job interviews altogether
 - B. It allows employers to assess body language while saving travel costs
 - C. It only works for entry-level roles
 - D. It ensures all candidates receive job offers
10. Why is active listening important in an interview?
- A. To reduce the time of the interview
 - B. To avoid unnecessary conversation
 - C. To fully understand responses and ask relevant follow-up questions
 - D. To limit the candidate's speaking time

Short Answer Type Questions

1. Define an interview and explain its importance in business and management.
2. Differentiate between structured and unstructured interviews.
3. List three best practices for interviewers to conduct an effective interview.
4. What are the key elements of preparing for an interview as a candidate?
5. Why is an exit interview conducted, and how does it benefit an organization?

Long Answer Type Questions

1. Discuss the different types of interviews based on purpose, such as selection, appraisal, exit, and research interviews, with examples.
2. Explain the essential requisites and techniques for conducting an effective interview.
3. Describe common mistakes made by interviewees and interviewers during the interview process. Suggest ways to avoid them.

Unit 9-Group Discussion

Structure

- 9.0 Introduction
- 9.1 Objectives
- 9.2 Definition and Concept of Group Discussion
- 9.3 Need and Importance of group Discussion
- 9.4 Types of Group Discussion
- 9.5 Components of a Group Discussion
- 9.6 Crisis Communication
- 9.7 Real-life Examples of Crisis Communication
- 9.8 Do's and Don'ts in the wake of a Crisis
- 9.9 Learning Outcomes
- 9.10 Model Examination Questions

9.0 Introduction

A Group Discussion (GD) is a structured way to communicate in which people share their thoughts, feelings, and arguments about a certain subject in a group setting. A group discussion is a planned conversation among people about a certain topic. The point is to test their leadership, communication, teamwork, and ability to solve problems. Group discussions, on the other hand, are more like real-life situations where people have to explain their thoughts, consider other points of view, and work together to reach a shared goal.

Group discussions are important for more than just placements. They are used in business to come up with ideas, make decisions, and develop strategies. For MBA students, group discussions aren't just practice for classrooms; they are like real-life business situations where teams come up with ideas, settle disagreements, handle crises, or agree on important issues. Whether they are in a recruitment GD, a boardroom debate, or a strategic planning session, MBA students as future managers need to be able to confidently say what they think, actively listen, handle disagreements in a diplomatic way, and lead group outcomes to meaningful conclusions. Let us learn how to confidently prepare for, take part in, and lead group discussions in this chapter.

9.1 Objectives

On completing the lesson, learners will be able to:

- Engage effectively in group settings, fostering productive dialogues and respecting diverse perspectives.

- Assess different viewpoints critically.
- Learn strategies to manage crises with clarity and composure.
- Take initiative in shaping discussions.
- Strike a balance without dominating, interrupting, or being unprepared.

9.2 Definition and Concept of GD

A Group Discussion (GD) is an organized communication method in which several people converse with one another to share thoughts, viewpoints, and arguments on a certain subject. It is an interactive procedure designed to evaluate participants' critical thinking and communication abilities as well as analyse problems, solve them, and make decisions. GDs are frequently employed in corporate meetings, brainstorming sessions, team collaborations, and recruitment procedures.

Important features of a group discussion:

- It involves several participants, usually between five and twelve.
- Focuses on a certain subject or problem (abstract, corporate, social, or economic topics).
- Promotes the free flow of ideas within a set period of time.
- Assesses the ability to communicate, solve problems, and make decisions.

Purpose of group discussion

- Used as an evaluation tool – Used in interviews and admissions to assess candidates' communication skills, confidence, and ability to think critically.
- Used in knowledge sharing – Helps participants learn from each other's viewpoints and broaden their understanding.
- Used in problem-solving – Encourages collaborative solutions to issues through collective reasoning.
- For teamwork and leadership – Highlights participants' abilities to work in a team, take initiative, and lead discussions effectively

The key skills required for effective participation in a group discussion are as follows:

1. Communication: In a group discussion, it is important to be clear and articulate. It is best for people to be clear and to the point when they talk, without using vagueness or slang that other people might not understand. It is also important to listen actively. To do this, you must pay close attention to and value other people's points of view. This helps you reply with care and add to what other people have said. It is also very important to communicate without words. A good stance, eye contact, and positive body language can all make you feel more interested and confident. When you want to get your point across without going on and on, practise summarising things clearly. This way, the main point stays the same.

2. Collaboration: A key part of a good group discussion is getting people to take part. Making the space welcoming by asking quieter people to share their thoughts shows that you can encourage teamwork and value different points of view. Building unity is just as important. Instead of forcing your opinion on the group, try to lead them to agree with each other. It is important to be able to resolve differences well when they happen. This means being polite to people who have different ideas, recognising and respecting those differences, and leading the conversation towards positive and unified results.
3. Critical thinking: For group discussions to work, people need to be able to think critically and creatively at the same time. Problem-solving means looking at a problem logically and coming up with useful, well-thought-out answers that fix the problem. To make your points stronger, use fact-based research and back them up with relevant data, examples, or case studies as much as you can. Questioning and reasoning are also very important. By questioning ideas in a constructive way and sharing different points of view, you encourage the group to think more deeply and critically. Lastly, being creative adds value to the discussion by giving it new ideas or different points of view that make your addition stand out and get other people thinking in new ways.
4. Leadership: Leadership skills are important in a group discussion because they help keep things upbeat and moving along. One important thing is to be tough. You are sure of yourself and want to do something when you offer to start the talk or round up the main points. Another important trait is being able to steer the conversation and keep it on track. Leaders who are good at delegating might also try giving out less formal jobs, like keeping time or taking notes, to keep the conversation on track. Finally, it is important to keep the group going. Focussing on the good things, even when people are fighting, helps them work together and keeps them interested.
5. Persuasion and influence: These are powerful tools that can help you influence people's thoughts and take the conversation forward. For the best results, combine the three basic methods of persuasion—ethos, pathos, and logos. Credibility is crucial for ethos. When you discuss meaningful experiences or expertise, you establish authority and trust. Pathos relates with emotions; thus, you can capture people's attention by discussing shared concerns, beliefs, or experiences. Logos is founded on logical thinking, which involves presenting arguments that are clear, well-organised, and supported by facts or evidence. Along with these strategies, trust is crucial. Speak with conviction yet maintain a courteous and cooperative tone to positively impact the group without coming across as rude or condescending.

6. Time management: People in a group need to be able to keep track of time and stay on topic for the talk to go well. To make good use of time, you should do the most important things first and avoid unnecessary distractions or repetition. Being brief and getting right to the point helps the discussion stay on track with its goal. It is also important to make sure that everyone has an equal chance to take part. Everyone should know how much time they have and make sure everyone gets to talk. This not only makes everyone want to join, but it also shows that you know how to lead and understand the group.

9.3 Need and importance of Group Discussion

Group Discussions (GDs) are crucial for managers and leaders as they cultivate important abilities necessary for the ever-evolving landscape of business and management. People who work in businesses need to be able to think critically, communicate clearly, work as a team, and make quick, beneficial decisions. GDs help people develop these skills. The role played by GD and the need for it are as follows:

1. Enhances communication skills: People can express their thoughts more confidently and clearly when they participate in group conversations. GDs enhance people's capacity for verbal communication, understanding what they hear, and persuasion. Additionally, it promotes the use of proper language and tone in professional contexts.
2. Develops critical thinking and analytical ability: People learn how to analyze things logically in GD. It helps you figure out things and decide what to do. Also, it tells people to think about things from different angles before making decisions.
3. Builds teamwork and collaboration: At GD, you can work with people from different walks of life. People learn how groups work and how important it is to work together. It also helps experts understand things better by seeing them from various angles.
4. Prepares for corporate recruitment and job roles: A lot of businesses use group discussions to rate job applicants while they are hiring. With the help of GD, students can do better in job interviews and test sites. It also gives them the tools they need to talk and meet for real business purposes.

5. Develops leadership and initiative: Group discussions help people take the lead in talks and use their own initiative. teaches how to handle conflicts and helps groups think together. Improves the ability to persuade others, which is important for leading roles.
6. Trains for real-world business scenarios: Group discussions replicate professional settings in which choices are reached collaboratively. They also facilitate crisis communication and the management of high-pressure scenarios. Also, GDs enhance adaptability and rapid understanding.

9.4 Types of Group Discussions

Group Discussions (GDs) manifest in diverse formats, each aimed at evaluating particular competencies like communication, analytical reasoning, creativity, and decision-making. Each form of GD enhances particular business competencies, including analytical thinking, leadership, strategic decision-making, and interpersonal communication, equipping students for corporate difficulties. Let us take a closer look at the different types.

1. Topic-based group discussions

- a. Factual topics: This is the most popular type of group discussion where people talk about current events, the economy, new technologies, or just about anything else. This GD tests your understanding, your ability to think clearly, and your ability to make points that make sense. For instance, "The Effects of Digital Payments on the Indian Economy" shows what this means.
- b. Controversial topics: Talking about things that make people feel strongly requires a mature attitude when managing them. Checks measures of emotional control, conflict resolution, and tolerance. For example, "Should the death penalty be ended?"
- c. Abstract topics: Interpretation, judging originality, and intellectual thinking are all possible. There are no right or wrong answers; each participant is judged on how special they are. "A world without borders" is an example.
- d. Business and management topics: When it comes to business trends, rules, and market changes. Checks for knowledge of the business, ability to make decisions, and strategic thinking. Example: "Does artificial intelligence pose a job threat?"

2. Case-based group discussions (Case Studies): Case-based group discussions focus on thinking about and analysing a case study, which can be based on real events or made up ones. Participants are expected to look at the case, figure out what the main problems are, and come up with solutions or plans as a group. These talks test your ability to think critically, solve problems, and make decisions. They also encourage you to take a realistic, results-driven approach to problems you face.
3. Role-playing group discussion: People take on specific jobs in a simulated business setting, such as CEO, HR Manager, or Customer. Tests communication, negotiation, and understanding in real-life situations. For example: "Boardroom meeting to see if merging with a competitor is possible."
4. Organised group discussions: Organised group discussions are planned conversations where people think about a certain problem or topic within a set of rules. They are often used in professional or academic settings to test people's ability to communicate, think critically, work as a team, and solve problems. A moderator guides the tests. These conversations have a goal, are timed, and encourage people to work together while still respecting different points of view. Their structured nature makes sure that everyone works hard and makes useful efforts.
5. Unorganised group discussions: When group discussions aren't planned ahead of time, they are called unorganised group discussions. There is no leader or structure to the conversation. People share their thoughts or ideas without planning, which can make conversations free-flowing but sometimes disorganised. Even though they promote innovation and open communication, the lack of focus could lead to missed goals or some voices being overshadowed by others.
6. Crisis or situation-focused group discussions: Problem- or situation-based group discussions have people look at and figure out how to handle a problem or situation that is given to them. There are times when people need to be able to think deeply, make choices, and work together well. Participants must come up with workable answers, defend their points of view, and work together to make a choice. This is to show how well they can handle problems in the real world.

9.5 Components of a Group Discussion

A successful group discussion is akin to a skilfully performed symphony, as each participant contributes unique elements to enhance the overall sound. Let us see the major components of a GD.

1. The topic: Any group discussion starts with the topic, which tells everyone what to talk about and how to talk about it. There are a variety of topics on which group discussions can take place in business environments. For example, the question "Is honesty the best policy?" can be very general and encourage people to think about it from moral, psychological, or personal points of view. The topic could also be current events-related, like "The effect of AI on business strategies." In this case, participants would have to use recent events, industry trends, and real-world effects to support their arguments. Case-based discussions are sometimes used. In these types of discussions, people are given a made-up business problem or situation that they must work together to figure out. You can also group topics by how they are structured. Open-ended questions allow for many interpretations and points of view, which boosts creativity and conversation. Focused topics, on the other hand, are more detailed and analytical. Participants are often asked to look at data, draw conclusions, or make choices based on the information they are given. The type of topic has a big impact on where the conversation goes and what skills people bring to the table.
2. Participants: People who are part of a group discussion are very important to moving the talk forward. Five to twelve people usually attend a GD. Each brings their own background, information, and point of view to the table. This variety makes the conversation more interesting and more like a real business setting, where working together as a team with people who have different backgrounds is important. During a discussion, people often take on different parts. Some people may start the conversation and set the tone with confidence. Others may take part as contributors, openly sharing their thoughts and ideas during the session. There are also fans who add to or back up what other people have said, which helps build a sense of teamwork and agreement. Finally, summarisers are helpful at the end of a discussion because they show the main points or conclusions that were reached during the conversation. Professionals who are evaluating potential leaders pay close attention to a number of traits, such as their communication skills, ability to work with others, ability to solve problems, and potential to be a leader. How each person adds to the conversation—whether it is through clear communication, logical reasoning, or respectful teamwork—shows how ready they are for managerial and leadership roles in a business setting.

3. Moderator: There needs to be a moderator or evaluator in formal group discussions, especially when they are used for job interviews. They are supposed to keep an open mind and help guide the talk while remaining impartial. In most situations, the moderator's job is to set the rules, introduce the topic to the participants, and make sure the talk goes in a respectful and organised way. Even though they don't take part in the talk, they can step in if it gets off track, gets out of hand, or if time needs to be managed. As for the evaluator, their job is to watch the players and rate them based on a set of predetermined criteria. These can include how well you speak, what you say, how engaged you are with the group, how well you listen, and how you act as a team. Some of the skills that are looked for are leadership, creativity, confidence, and the ability to work with others. These are all skills that are highly valued in business and management positions. The evaluator carefully watches each participant to see how well they show the skills that are needed for a future boss or leader.
4. Evaluation parameters: When people take part in formal GDs, they are graded on a set of clear criteria that show important management and people skills. These criteria help judge not only what people say, but also how they add to the quality and usefulness of the conversation as a whole.
 - a. Content: The relevance, originality, and depth of the ideas a person shares demonstrate their understanding and readiness. Well-researched and insightful comments show that the author can think critically and knows a lot about the subject.
 - b. Clarity: It is very important to be able to communicate well in a GD. The participants are graded on how well they explain their ideas and how correctly they make their case. Clear and clear communication helps people make their points more powerful.
 - c. Work as a team: A good member not only talks well, but also listens carefully and treats others with respect. Strong relationship and teamwork skills include being able to work together, support other members, and help reach a decision.
 - d. Leadership: People who step up, keep the conversation on track, or help settle disagreements show that they have the ability to be leaders. Leading doesn't mean controlling; it means leading the group in a good way.
 - e. Etiquette: It is important to act professionally during a GD. This means listening to what others have to say, not talking over them, waiting for the right time to speak, and following the group's rules. Following proper manners shows that you are emotionally intelligent and mature.

5. Outcomes: The outcome or conclusion of a group talk is contingent upon its goal and setting. In some GDs, especially those that are about making decisions or solving problems, the group may reach a consensus, which means that everyone agrees on a final answer or point of view. This shows that you can work together well and think logically. Sometimes, like during brainstorming meetings, the goal is not to come to a single decision but to come up with a lot of different ideas. There is less focus on agreement and more on creativity in these talks. Each input is valued for what it brings to the table and how it could be used. When GDs are used in official evaluation settings, like job interviews or school tests, the result is usually a personal evaluation. In these situations, what matters most is not what the group decides, but how each person adds. Communicating, working with others, being a leader, and other important traits are evaluated. No matter what format is used, a well-run GD should end with a short summary or reflection on the key points that were talked about. This helps people remember the session's purpose and learning outcomes.

9.6 Crisis Communication

A crisis refers to an unexpected and often disruptive event or situation that poses a significant threat to individuals, organizations, communities, or even entire systems. It usually demands urgent action, as it can harm reputation, operations, finances, or safety. A crisis in a business environment refers to an unpredictable event or situation that disrupts normal operations, poses significant risks to the organization, and may harm its reputation, finances, employees, or stakeholders. These crises can arise from both internal and external factors and require immediate and strategic responses to mitigate their impact.

Since you are well going to be in the corporate scenario soon, you will need to know more about crisis and its management. All stakeholders will have to rise to the occasion and play their role. MBA students as leaders of tomorrow will have to step up and take part actively to try and mitigate the crisis, if and when it arises.

There are several main things about a business crisis that make it very hard to handle. Unpredictability is one of the most important characteristics; it often happens without notice, leaving businesses unprepared and off guard. This fast start makes you feel like you need to make quick decisions and take action right away to limit the damage that could happen. Crisis situations usually have a lot at stake because they can lead to bad things like losing money, having the company's image hurt, or even having to shut down. A crisis generally has more than one effect; it can change not only operations but also employee morale, customer trust, and the stability of the organisation as a whole.

Crisis communication is a strategic approach used by organisations and individuals to effectively communicate during and after a crisis. Its main goal is to keep workers, customers, the public, and the media informed, reassured, and guided while minimising harm and preserving trust. In business situations, crisis communication includes making a plan, picking spokespeople, putting out press releases, using social media, and keeping the trust of all stakeholders. The core principles of crisis communication are as follows:

1. Timeliness: Timeliness is essential, as responding promptly prevents the spread of misinformation or panic.
2. Transparency: Transparency plays a critical role, as being open and honest about the situation builds trust while avoiding speculation.
3. Consistency: Consistency ensures that all messages align across different platforms and spokespeople.
4. Empathy: Showing empathy is equally crucial, as it demonstrates care and understanding for those affected.
5. Clarity: Clear and direct communication is also necessary, especially during high-stress situations, to ensure messages are understood without confusion.

The significance of crisis communication is immense. Let us look in detail its significance:

- Managing unforeseen situations: Crisis communication equips individuals with the skills to address unforeseen issues or sensitive topics that surface during group discussions. It makes sure that conversations stay on track and useful even when things are stressful.
- Maintaining composure and clarity: Effective communication helps people say what they're thinking in a calm and clear way during times of stress. This keeps mistakes and emotional responses from getting in the way of the conversation and encourages a calm, problem-solving approach.
- Collaborative problem-solving: Communication during a crisis motivates people to work together to solve problems. It encourages people to listen, understand, and share their thoughts, which helps the group think critically about the problem and come up with workable answers.

- Building trust and leadership: Crisis communication that works well shows leadership skills and builds trust within the group. By dealing with crises well, participants show that they can lead discussions to positive results and build trust.
- Adapting to pressure and different points of view: Crisis communication stresses being flexible and open to different points of view. This makes sure that different points of view are taken into account while dealing with tough scenarios. It creates a good atmosphere that values working together and making progress as a group.

9.7 Real-life Examples of Crisis Communication

There have been many instances where both startups and well-established companies have faced crises. While some handled these situations well and immediately mitigated the effects of the crisis, others could not do so well and faced severe damage. Let us take a look at these.

Successful Crisis Communication Examples

1. The Kurkure Plastic Allegations (2017): Kurkure is PepsiCo India's snack made of potatoes coated with masala to suit the Indian palette. In mid 2017, rumours started circulating on social media that the snack was made of plastic. Though the origins of the rumours could not be traced to a single source, Facebook and YouTube was awash with videos of people conducting their own little experiments of burning the snack and displaying the black residue it left - leading the general population to believe that Kurkure really was plastic.

Fig 9.1 PepsiCo's advertisement in response to the Kurkure crisis

PepsiCo immediately took notice and launched several campaigns to clear the misconception. It explained that the burning effect was due to the high oil and carbohydrate content in Kurkure, which is common in fried snacks. The company invited bloggers and influencers to visit their manufacturing facilities to witness the production process firsthand. PepsiCo also filed a defamation suit against social media platforms to remove misleading posts and videos. While the controversy initially damaged Kurkure's reputation, PepsiCo's proactive measures helped restore consumer trust. The incident highlighted the importance of swift and transparent crisis communication in addressing misinformation. Fig 9.1 is the picture of an advertisement PepsiCo published in leading dailies and social media as a crisis communication strategy.

2. Johnson & Johnson - Tylenol Poisoning (1982): Tylenol, manufactured by Johnson & Johnson is a popular paracetamol in the USA. In late 1982, some malicious person(s) replaced the Tylenol capsules with cyanide-laced capsules, resealed the packages, and distributed them to about half a dozen pharmacies across Chicago (USA). People as usual purchased the capsules and seven persons died due to the poisoning. Suddenly, Johnson and Johnson was under media and public scrutiny for something they were not involved in. They formed a seven-member strategy team and focused on two questions: "How do we protect the people?", "How do we save this product?" Johnson & Johnson launched an investigation and found the poisoned packages in and around Chicago. Though the possibility of finding contaminated bottles elsewhere in America was slim, they pulled every single bottle of Tylenol from store shelves across the nation, issued public warnings, and cooperated fully with media and law enforcement. Within six months of the crisis, they introduced tamper-proof packaging. This crisis communication succeeded because of prompt action, transparency, prioritising customer safety over profits, and rebuilding trust through innovation.

You can find more case studies on crisis communication using the resource as given on The University of Oklahoma's URL:

<https://www.ou.edu/deptcomm/dodjcc/groups/02C2/statement%20of%20problem.htm>

Failed Crisis Communication Examples

1. Maggi Noodles - Lead Controversy (2015): Maggi a well-known noodles brand in India, was accused of containing excess lead and Monosodium Glutamate (MSG) leading to a nationwide ban. Nestle, Maggi's parent company, initially denied the allegations and delayed public engagement. This delay allowed misinformation and panic to spread widely among consumers. Loyal customers shifted to other instant noodle brands like Sunfeast and Ramen. This created mistrust regarding not just Maggi, but also about other products by Nestle. The company faced legal battles, and significant backlash, which highlighted gaps in their preparedness for such a crisis. Though it recalled products worth crores of rupees, public trust had already eroded. The crisis and its not-so-proactive response caused significant financial and reputational damage to Maggi. It took a long while for the company to regain its footing by launching a marketing campaign and reintroducing Maggi to its Indian customer base.

2. BP - Deepwater Horizon Oil Spill (2010): British Petrochemical Corporation leased the Deepwater Horizon rig in the Gulf of Mexico (south-eastern coast of North America). In April 2010, the rig exploded that led to a massive environmental disaster. Fishing, tourism, corals, and plant and animal life were severely affected. In total, 1770 km of shoreline were polluted. BP's CEO made defensive and tone-deaf comments like "I'd like my life back," and the company was slow in acknowledging the scope of the disaster. This crisis communication failed because of lack of empathy, poor leadership visibility and delayed messaging.

9.8 Dos and Don'ts in the wake of a crisis

In the fast-paced world of business, crises are inevitable. Effective crisis management is not just about damage control; it is an opportunity to demonstrate resilience, transparency, and leadership. By understanding the essential do's and don'ts of crisis response, businesses can navigate turbulent times with integrity and emerge stronger.

Do's:

1. Acknowledge the crisis promptly: In a crisis, speed is very important. Not recognizing or reacting to a situation right away can cause confusion, false information, and a loss of trust among stakeholders. Taking action quickly shows that the company is aware, in charge, and determined to fix the problem. Even if you don't have all the facts yet, a reaction that shows you are aware and concerned is better than nothing.
2. Communicate clearly and honestly: Being open and honest builds trust. It is very important to communicate in a clear, direct, and honest way during a disaster. Stakeholders want to know the truth about what happened, how the company is handling it, and what will happen next. Don't use jargon or make vague comments. Instead, give people useful information that helps them understand what is going on.

3. Show that you care: Crisis communication is not just about facts; it is also about feelings. Empathy helps humanize the organization and connect with affected individuals. Acknowledging the emotional and personal impact of the crisis—whether it involves customers, employees, or the general public—shows that the organization cares about more than just its reputation or profits.
4. Designate a spokesperson: It is important to have a skilled spokesperson or crisis communication team in place to make sure that communication is consistent and professional. Having different voices send mixed messages can confuse people and hurt the organisation's trustworthiness. A main spokesperson helps keep the story under control and makes sure that all interactions are in line with the facts and values of the organisation.
5. Focus on solutions: Businesses should prioritise damage control following a crisis to contain and mitigate damage. Fixing operational issues, responding to stakeholders, and managing public opinion are pressing priorities. A forward-thinking perspective is also crucial. Organisations must investigate the crisis's causes and develop long-term solutions to avoid future crises. This may involve upgrading processes, personnel training, communication, or contingency preparations.
6. Monitor reactions: How the public responds, especially on social media, can change how well the situation is seen to be being handled. Organisations should keep a close eye on how the public feels, how the media covers them, and what their stakeholders have to say. This helps find misunderstandings, false information, or new worries so that methods for communicating can be changed as needed.
7. Learn and improve: It is very important to carefully look over what went right and wrong after the situation is over. This review helps businesses make their crisis communication plans better, train their teams better, and get ready for future problems. When you learn from a disaster, you can turn a bad situation into a chance to grow and become stronger.

Don'ts:

1. Don't delay your response: It is very bad to wait to respond in the hopes that the problem will go away on its own or not be noticed at all. The longer an organisation doesn't say anything, the more likely it is that rumours and bad stories will fill the gap. Quick contact, even if it's not a lot, shows that you are responsible and a leader.

2. Do not lie or hide facts: During a crisis, telling lies or leaving out important facts can really hurt the organization's image. Information leaks and spies are common in this digital age, so any dishonesty is likely to be found out. It is much harder for an organisation to gain back the public's trust once it has lost it.
3. Don't ignore internal communication: Even though talking to the public is important, companies should not forget about their own stakeholders, like their workers. Employees should be among the first to know about the problem and how the company is handling it. Keeping them in the dark can cause stress, loss of interest, and even leaks that do damage.
4. Don't make rash decisions: In a crisis, rash moves might worsen the situation. Firms should use an organised decision-making process that involves analysis, stakeholder interaction, and outcome review. This method entails obtaining all crises facts, researching various solutions, and weighing their pros and disadvantages.
5. Don't assume that one statement is enough: Crises are often changing and complicated, so people need to keep talking to each other. Most of the time, one news release or social media post is not enough. People need to be kept aware and involved by regular updates as the situation changes.
6. Don't forget about social media: Social media has a big impact on how people think and feel. Ignoring it during a crisis can let false stories grow without being stopped. Organisations should keep an eye on and interact with people on social media to quickly clear up facts, fix false information, and address public concerns.
7. Don't neglect preparation for future crises: Every crisis offers lessons that might help an organisation guard against future crises. Businesses can find system, process, and communication vulnerabilities by undertaking a thorough post-crisis investigation. These insights should be used to improve contingency planning to better prepare the organisation for unexpected situations. Regular risk assessments, employee training, and explicit crisis communication protocols can mitigate future catastrophes.

9.9 Learning Outcomes

This unit goes into detail about the idea of Group Discussions (GD) and shows how important they are in both work and academic settings, especially for MBA students who want to become managers and leaders. It starts with an explanation of GDs as organised ways for people to talk to each other, share their ideas, work together to solve problems, and show important skills like teamwork, leadership, and critical thinking. GDs are like real-life business situations that are acted out in real life. They prepare people to deal with problems like crises and help make smart decisions in the workplace.

The unit focuses on the important parts of a successful GD, such as choosing a topic, participant jobs, moderator participation, evaluation criteria, and expected outcomes. It talks about how GDs help people learn skills like collaboration, critical thought, leadership, time management, and good verbal and nonverbal communication. These skills not only help people get ready for job interviews and other company hiring processes, but they also teach them how to deal with problems in real life, which makes them more confident and able to adapt.

Another important part is about how to communicate in a disaster, which is an important part of running a business. It says that a crisis is an unplanned event that stops a business from running and calls for quick and smart answers. The crisis communication principles of timeliness, transparency, consistency, empathy, and clarity are looked at in detail. This shows how good communication during disasters can help people trust each other, stay calm, and work together to solve problems. Real-life examples of how to handle a crisis well, such as how PepsiCo responded to the claims about Kurkure plastic and how Johnson & Johnson handled the Tylenol poisoning crisis, show how taking action can limit damage and rebuild trust. On the other hand, examples of bad crisis communication, like how Nestlé handled the Maggi scandal and how BP responded to the Deepwater Horizon oil spill, show what happens when you wait too long to respond or send the wrong message.

Lastly, the unit gives a complete list of what to do and what not to do in crisis management. This gives businesses useful advice on how to handle problems well. Some important things to do are to acknowledge things right away, communicate clearly, show empathy, choose a spokesperson, and focus on finding answers. The don'ts stress the importance of avoiding delays, lying, making snap choices, and ignoring social media or getting ready for future crises. At the end of the unit, it is emphasized how important it is to learn from disasters in order to improve backup plans and make organizations more resilient.

9.10 Model Examination Questions

Fill in the blanks

1. A structured form of communication in which individuals communicate ideas on a specific topic is known as a _____. (Answer: Group Discussion)

2. In a GD, participants are able to articulate their thoughts with clarity and confidence when they possess strong _____ skills. (Answer: Communication)
3. Participants are able to construct logical arguments and analyse a variety of viewpoints through _____ thinking. (Answer: Critical)
4. In a case-based discussion, students are provided with a real or hypothetical _____ scenario to analyse and resolve. (Answer: Business)
5. During a crisis communication GD, it is important to remain _____ and avoid spreading misinformation. (Answer: Calm)
6. Good _____ skills are equally critical to speaking, as they facilitate comprehension of others' viewpoints. (Answer: Listening)
7. A crisis is an unexpected event that disrupts normal operations and demands _____ action. (Answer: urgent)
8. During a crisis, the designated _____ ensures that all communication is clear and unified. (Answer: spokesperson)
9. Maggi faced severe backlash due to its initial denial and _____ in public communication. (Answer: delay)
10. One major consequence of poor crisis communication is loss of _____ and customer trust. (Answer: reputation)

Short Answer Type Questions

1. What is the significance of group discussions for aspiring managers?
2. Identify two distinct categories of group discussions and provide a brief explanation.
3. What is the significance of communication in the context of an effective GD?
4. What is the significance of listening skills in a group discussion?
5. In what ways can body language influence your participation in a group discussion?
6. What are the main characteristics of a business crisis?
7. Why is empathy important in crisis communication?
8. Explain the significance of crisis communication.
9. What is the role of social media in crisis management?
10. Describe the core principles of effective crisis communication.

Long Answer Questions

1. Explain the concept of Group Discussion and its importance in management education.
Explain the different types of group discussions.
2. Explain the essential elements of a successful group discussion?
3. Define crisis communication and explain its significance in business environments.
4. Explain the primary dos and don'ts in the wake of a crisis.
5. Compare and contrast successful and failed crisis communication using real-life Indian and global examples.

Unit 10-Written Communication

Structure

- 10.0 Introduction
- 10.1 Objectives
- 10.2 Written Communication
- 10.3 Definitions of Report Writing
- 10.4 Types of Reports
- 10.5 Structure of Reports in Business Communication
- 10.6 Essentials of Good Report Writing
- 10.7 Learning Outcomes
- 10.8 Model Examination Questions

10.0 Introduction

Communication is the foundation of every successful business organization. Business Communication is sharing information within and outside an organization to achieve business objectives. It plays a crucial role in decision-making, coordination, and maintaining professional relationships.

This unit explores the key aspects of business communication, including written communication, report writing, types of reports, and their structure.

Written communication is an essential part of professional interactions, ensuring clarity and accuracy are essentials of it. It is a permanent record of business activities. Reports are major component of written communication. They serve to convey important data, findings, and recommendations in a structured manner. Understanding different types of reports, their purpose, and essential elements of report writing enables professionals to communicate effectively in business settings.

By the end of this unit, learners will be able to comprehend the significance of written communication, differentiate between various types of reports, and apply report-writing skills in business scenarios.

10.1 Objectives

After studying this unit, learners will be able to:

- Explain the role and characteristics of written communication in business.
- Identify different types of reports and their significance in decision-making.
- Analyse the structure of business reports and their essential components.

- Differentiate between individual and committee reports based on their purpose and authorship.

10.2 Written Communication:

Written communication refers to the exchange of information through written symbols. Letters, emails, reports, memos, and documents. It is a formal and structured way of conveying messages that ensures clarity, accuracy, and documentation.

Features of Written Communication:

1. Permanent Record: Written documents serve as permanent record for future use.
2. Clarity and Precision: Written Messages are clearly framed and Precisely written to prevent confusion.
3. Formal and Professional: Written communication is Commonly employed in business, academic, and legal environments.
4. Non-Immediate Feedback: to Written communication is not immediate and can be delayed.

10.3 Definitions of Report Writing

Following are some definitions of Report Writing given by various authors:

1. According to Ober (2001): "A report is a written, factual report that is intended to inform, analyse, and recommend. It is an organized document prepared for an indicated audience and purpose."
2. Murphy and Hildebrandt (1991): "Report writing is a formal way of reporting information that is factual, objective, and organized to facilitate decision-making."
3. Lesikar and Pettit (1998): "A report is a systematic and objective presentation of facts used to provide findings, conclusions, and recommendations."
4. Anderson (1987): "Report writing is the process of gathering and presenting data in an organized form to promote understanding and decision making."

10.4 Types of Reports

Reports are categorized according to their purpose, structure, and audience. Following are the fundamental types of reports.

1. Informational Reports: These reports present factual information without analysis or recommendations. They are objective and report information systematically.

Examples:

- Annual Reports: Summarize an organization's activities for a year.
 - Financial Reports: Present financial performance, including income statements and balance sheets.
 - Progress Reports: Report on the status of current activities
 - Incident Reports: Document specific incidents, e.g., accidents or security violations.
2. Analytical Reports: Such reports do not just present facts; they report on facts, analyzing and drawing conclusions or making recommendations. They facilitate decision-making.

Examples:

- Feasibility Reports: Decide if a project or investment is feasible.
 - Market Research Reports: Examine Customer's tastes, competitors, and trends.
 - Risk Assessment Reports: Determine and quantify risks in business ventures.
 - Problem-Solving Reports: Examine a problem and recommend solutions.
3. Proposal Reports: Proposal reports propose a solution, usually seeking approval or financial support. They are intended to convince stakeholders.

Examples:

- Business Proposals: Details a new business concept, such as costs, forecasted income, and market studies.
 - Project Proposals: Records details of new projects to management or investors.
 - Research Proposals: Outline research aims, methods, and anticipated results.
4. Progress Reports: These reports provide information on the progress on projects, specifying completed work, current issues, and future actions.

Examples:

- Construction Progress Reports: Reports work done on a construction site.
 - Academic Research Progress Reports: Reports the progress of a research project.
 - Employee Performance Reports: Evaluates the progress of an employee's work over time.
5. Technical Reports: Technical reports hold technical and specialized data concerning scientific or technical disciplines.

Examples:

- Engineering Reports: Provides technical information on infrastructure, designs, or machinery.
- IT Reports: Reports system performance, software development status, or cybersecurity attacks.

- Scientific Research Reports: Reports experimental steps, results, and conclusions

6. Business Reports: They are used widely in a corporate environment for conveying information, performance, and strategies.

Examples:

- Sales Reports: Reports sales data and trends during a defined time frame.
- Customer Feedback Reports: Report customer reviews and grievances.
- Operational Reports: Provides analysis of the efficiency of company procedures.

7. Formal and Informal Reports

- Formal Reports: They have a defined structure with fields such as title, summary, introduction, body, and conclusion. They are Employed in business and academic environments.
- Informal Reports: They do not follow any specific structures. They are written according to the performance of writer. They are used to report an incident or situation.

8. Individual and Committee Reports

- Individual Reports: They are written by an individual and mirror personal analysis.
- Committee Reports: They are written by a team after discussion and arguments on the matter.

9. Statutory and Non-Statutory Reports

- Statutory Reports: They are mandated by legislation, e.g., audit reports and financial reports.
- Non-Statutory Reports: They are not legally mandated but intended for decision-making within an organization.

10. Investigative Reports: Such reports investigate occurrences like fraud, accidents, or violation of policy and recommend redressing measures.

Examples:

- Fraud Investigation Reports: Investigate cases of financial wrongdoing or theft.
- Accident Investigation Reports: Describe causes of an accident and steps to avoid reoccurrence

10.5 Structure of Reports in Business Communication

Business reports tend to be formal documents drawn up for decision-making, analysis, or record-keeping purposes. A properly formatted business report guarantees clarity, professionalism, and effective communication. The following is a detailed outline of the composition of a business report:

1. Title Page: The title page contains the title of the report that tells the contents in a comprehensive manner. It consists of:
 - Title of the Report – Evidently shows the topic matter.
 - Author's Name – The individual or entity drawing up the report.
 - Recipient's Name – The person or department receiving the report.
 - Date of Submission – The submission date of the report.
 - Organisation Name (if applicable) – The institution or company involved.
2. Table of Contents: The table of contents is a list of the topics presents in the report and page numbers for quick reference.
3. Executive Summary: The executive summary is a brief summary of the whole report. It summarizes key points, findings, and recommendations in 1-2 paragraphs.
4. Introduction: The introduction gives background information and states the purpose of the report.

Key Elements:

- Purpose of the Report – Why it is being written?
 - Scope of the Report – What aspects are covered?
 - Audience – Who will read the report?
 - Methodology Overview – How data was collected?
5. Methodology: The methodology section describes the ways in which data was gathered and analysed.

Key Elements:

- Methods of Data Collection: Surveys, interviews, financial records, etc.
 - Sampling and Methods: Target group, geographic locations, etc. The method of selection of sample
 - Analysis Techniques: Statistical techniques, comparative analysis, etc.
6. Findings and Analysis: This is the report's main body, showing the most important information collected, analysed and interpreted.

Key Elements:

- Presentation of Data: Charts, graphs, and tables.
 - Comparison: Comparing past and present performance.
 - Problems and Challenges: Recognizing key problems.
7. Conclusions and Recommendations: This section encapsulates major findings and offers implementable recommendations.

Key Elements:

- Summary of Key Findings – A concise summary.
 - Recommendations – Implementable solutions based on findings.
 - Future Outlook – Projected effect of recommendations.
8. References: It is used to give sources of information and data used in the report.
9. Appendices (Optional): Appendices include additional information validating the report but that is too detailed for the main sections.

Individual and Committee Reports

Reports in business communication can be categorized on the basis of authorship. Two major categories on the basis of authorship are Individual Reports and Committee Reports.

1. Individual Reports

An Individual Report is prepared by an individual person. It contains personal findings, analysis, and conclusions drawn on the research or investigation done by the individual. Managers, executives, consultants, or employees prepare such reports generally as they are held accountable to analyse a given problem or job.

Key Features of Individual Reports:

- Prepared by an individual person.
- It includes personal research, analysis, and opinions.
- It is normally faster to prepare.
- It is more direct and to the point.
- There is one person to be held accountable.

Examples of Individual Reports:

- i. 1.Performance Report: A manager assessing an employee's performance.
- ii. 2.Survey Report: A researcher summarizing respondents opinions.
- iii. 3.Business Proposal Report: An entrepreneur drafting a funding proposal.
- iv. 4.Audit Report: A financial auditor reviewing a company's accounts.

2. Committee Reports

A Committee Report is drafted by a panel of people (committee) who work together to study, analyse, and submit results on a given topic. Reports are frequently applied in large-scale organizations, governmental institutions, and organizations where differing opinions are necessitated.

Characteristics of Committee Reports:

- Submitted by a group of people (committee members).
- Consists of collective recommendations, discussions, and findings.
- Tends to be more elaborate and extensive.
- Need coordination and concurrence among the members.
- Consists of several perspectives and expertise.

Types of Committee Reports:

- i. Standing Committee Reports: A standing committee is a permanent committee in organization structure deals with recurring work (e.g., reports by finance committee).
- ii. Ad Hoc Committee Reports: committee created temporarily for a precise purpose or temporary work is called Ad Hoc Committee. (e.g., reports by investigation committee).
- iii. Investigation Reports: Drafted by a special committee to investigate a problem (e.g., report on fraud investigation).
- iv. Policy Recommendation These are the reports of recommendations presented by committees to suggest policy frame work for organizational enhancement (e.g., recommendations by HR).

10.6 Essentials of Good Report Writing

A good report has to be structured, clear, and professional in writing. Listed below are the most important characteristics of effective report writing for conveying effectiveness and clearness in business communication.

1. Clarity and Conciseness

- Clear and concise reports should avoid detailed information if it is unnecessary.
- Use unadorned simple language that transmits information without ambiguity.
- Unless required don't use jargon terms if used provide meanings when terms have technical significance.

2. Proper Structure and Organization

A properly structured report enhances readability and comprehension. A common structure consists of:

- i. Title Page
- ii. Table of Contents
- iii. Executive Summary
- iv. Introduction
- v. Methodology
- vi. Findings and Analysis
- vii. Conclusions and Recommendations
- viii. References and Appendices

3. Accuracy and Reliability

- Data, facts, and figures should be accurate and well-researched.
- Utilize credible sources and authenticate information prior to its inclusion in the report.
- Misrepresentation or false data can result in incorrect decision-making.

4. Objectivity and Impartiality

- Reports must be objective and fact-based and not written from a personal perspective.
- Provide data and analysis in a non-hyperbolic manner and free of personal bias.

5. Logical Flow and Coherence

- Put information in order of logic so that it follows easily.
- Apply headings, subheadings, and bullet points to make the text readable.
- Be consistent with formatting, font, and style of writing.

6. Effective Formatting and Presentation

- Apply a professional font (e.g., Times New Roman or Arial, size 12).
- Apply bold headings and subheadings to facilitate navigation.
- Insert tables, charts, and graphs wherever required to display data.
- Use proper spacing and alignment.

7. Clear and Effective Summary

- The executive summary should give a concise but comprehensive overview of the report.
- It should emphasize major points, findings, and recommendations.
- It should be done after the report is completed but at the beginning.

8. Proper Grammar, Spelling, and Punctuation

- Avoid grammatical mistakes, spelling errors, and punctuation mistakes.
- Proofread and edit before submission.
- Use formal language and refrain from using slang or colloquial words.

9. Visual Aids

- Charts, graphs, and tables facilitate a better understanding and present a neat appearance to the report.
- Label and refer to visuals correctly in the text.

10.7 Learning Outcomes

After studying this unit, learners will be able to understand the concept and importance of report writing in business decision-making. They will gain knowledge of types, structure, and principles of effective reports. Learners will be able to collect, organize, analyze, and present information systematically in report form. The unit will also enable learners to develop clarity, objectivity, and professionalism in written reports.

10.8 Model Examination Questions

Multiple choice questions (MCQs)

1. What is the primary purpose of business communication?

- | | |
|--------------------------|--|
| a) Entertainment | b) Exchange of information for business objectives |
| c) Personal interactions | d) Social networking |

Answer: b) Exchange of information for business objectives

2. Which of the following is NOT an example of written communication?

- | | | | |
|-----------|------------|--------------------------|----------|
| a) Emails | b) Reports | c) Face-to-face meetings | d) Memos |
|-----------|------------|--------------------------|----------|

Answer: c) Face-to-face meetings

3. What is a key feature of written communication?

- | | |
|-----------------------|---------------------|
| a) Immediate feedback | b) Permanent record |
| c) Informal in nature | d) Always verbal |

Answer: b) Permanent record

4. Which type of report provides recommendations based on analysis?

- | | |
|-------------------------|----------------------|
| a) Informational report | b) Analytical report |
| c) Progress report | d) Incident report |

Answer: b) Analytical report

5. What is the main purpose of an executive summary in a business report?

- a) Provide detailed financial data
- b) Summarize key findings and recommendations
- c) Present personal opinions
- d) Include technical specifications

Answer: b) Summarize key findings and recommendations

6. A committee report is usually prepared by:

- a) A single individual
- b) A group of people
- c) The CEO alone
- d) A customer service representative

Answer: b) A group of people

7. Which of the following is an essential element of a good report?

- a) Personal opinions
- b) Clarity and conciseness
- c) Lengthy and complex sentences
- d) Exaggerated statements

Answer: b) Clarity and conciseness

8. A feasibility report is an example of which type of report?

- a) Informational report
- b) Analytical report
- c) Progress report
- d) Committee report

Answer: b) Analytical report

9. Which section of a business report contains data collection methods?

- a) Introduction
- b) Methodology
- c) Executive summary
- d) Conclusion

Answer: b) Methodology

10. What should be avoided in a formal business report?

- a) Use of headings and subheadings
- b) Proper formatting and structure
- c) Slang and informal language
- d) Charts and tables for data representation

Answer: c) Slang and informal language

Short Answer Type Questions

1. What is business communication, and why is it important?
2. What are the key differences between oral and written communication in a business setting?
3. What are the essential components of an effective business report?

Long Answer Type Questions

1. Explain the different types of business reports and their significance in decision-making.
2. Discuss the characteristics of effective business communication and the barriers that may hinder it.
3. Describe the structure of a formal business report and the role of each section

Unit 11-Business Correspondence

Structure

- 11.0 Introduction
- 11.1 Objectives
- 11.2 Business Correspondence
- 11.3 Importance of Business Correspondence
- 11.4 Business Letters
- 11.5 Effective Business Communication
- 11.6 Importance of Effective Business Communication
- 11.7 Writing Effective Emails
- 11.8 Drafting a Resume
- 11.9 Learning Outcomes
- 11.10 Model Examination Questions

11.0 Introduction

Effective communication is the foundation of professional success in the business world. Business correspondence refers to the formal exchange of information through written communication, ensuring clarity, professionalism, and efficiency in business interactions. Whether through business letters, emails, resumes, or presentations, the ability to convey messages effectively is essential for maintaining strong professional relationships and achieving organizational goals.

This unit explores various forms of business correspondence, including the structure and purpose of business letters, effective business communication techniques, email writing strategies, resume drafting, and professional styling in presentations. It provides a comprehensive understanding of how to craft clear, concise, and impactful messages tailored to different business contexts.

11.1 Objectives

By the end of this unit, learners will be able to:

- Understand the importance and components of business correspondence.
- Draft professional business letters for different purposes.
- Apply effective business communication strategies in written and verbal interactions.
- Write well-structured and professional emails.
- Create an impressive and organized resume for job applications.

11.2 Business Correspondence

Business Correspondence refers to the exchange of information in a written format for business purposes. It includes communication between businesses, organizations, and individuals in a professional setting. Business correspondence can take various forms, such as letters, emails, reports, and memos.

Types of Business Correspondence

1. Business Letters – Formal letters exchanged between companies or between a company and its stakeholders.
2. Emails – A quick and widely used form of business communication.
3. Memorandums (Memos) – Internal communication within an organization.
4. Reports – Detailed documents for analysis and decision-making.
5. Circulars – Notices issued to inform a large audience.
6. Notices – Formal announcements for employees or customers.
7. Invoices and Quotations – Financial documents exchanged between buyers and sellers.

11.3 Importance of Business Correspondence

Business correspondence plays a vital role in professional communication, ensuring smooth interactions between businesses, employees, clients, and stakeholders. It serves as a formal means of exchanging information, maintaining records, and enhancing professional relationships. The significance of business correspondence can be understood through the following key points:

1. Ensures Clarity and Precision

Written communication allows businesses to convey messages with clarity and accuracy. Unlike verbal communication, business correspondence eliminates the risk of misinterpretation by providing a clear record of discussions, agreements, and instructions. This ensures that all parties involved have a precise understanding of the information shared.

2. Formal Record

Business correspondence serves as official documentation of transactions, agreements, policies, and communications. These written records can be referred to in the future for verification, legal purposes, or conflict resolution. Maintaining proper records enhances transparency and accountability in business dealings.

3. Professionalism

Well-structured business correspondence reflects the professionalism of an organization. Properly drafted letters, emails, and reports create a positive impression and build credibility. Professional communication fosters trust and strengthens relationships with clients, partners, and employees.

4. Facilitates Effective Communication

Business correspondence ensures the efficient exchange of information between different departments, organizations, and stakeholders. It allows businesses to convey essential messages, such as company policies, updates, proposals, and feedback, in a structured and organized manner. Effective communication helps in decision-making and smooth business operations.

5. Strengthens Business Relationships

Maintaining consistent and professional correspondence helps businesses build and sustain relationships with clients, suppliers, investors, and employees. Whether it is responding to inquiries, addressing concerns, or sending appreciation letters, effective correspondence nurtures trust and long-term associations.

6. Aids in Marketing and Sales

Business correspondence is widely used for promotional activities, product inquiries, and customer engagement. Sales letters, marketing emails, and business proposals help companies attract new customers and retain existing ones. Well-crafted correspondence plays a key role in persuading potential clients and increasing sales.

7. Saves Time and Cost

Compared to face-to-face meetings, written business correspondence is a time-efficient and cost-effective communication method. Emails, memos, and digital reports allow instant communication, reducing the need for physical meetings and travel expenses. This leads to increased productivity and streamlined operations.

8. Helps in Conflict Resolution

Disputes and misunderstandings are common in business dealings. Business correspondence, such as complaint letters, adjustment letters, and legal notices, provides a formal platform for resolving conflicts. Written communication ensures that concerns are addressed professionally and systematically, minimizing potential disputes.

9. Ensures Legal Protection

In many cases, business correspondence serves as legal proof of agreements, policies, and transactions. Contracts, invoices, and official letters can be used in legal proceedings to resolve disputes or enforce compliance with business terms. Proper documentation safeguards businesses from potential liabilities.

10. Enhances Organizational Efficiency

A well-maintained system of business correspondence improves coordination within an organization. Internal communication through memos, reports, and circulars ensures that employees stay informed about company updates, goals, and expectations. This leads to better teamwork, productivity, and operational efficiency.

11.4 Business Letters

A business letter is a formal written communication used in professional settings for various purposes, such as making requests, providing information, or maintaining business relationships. These letters follow a structured format and professional tone.

Types of Business Letters

1. Inquiry Letter – Seeks information about products, services, or terms of business.
2. Order Letter – Used for placing an order for goods or services.
3. Quotation Letter – Sent in response to an inquiry, providing price details.
4. Complaint Letter – Expresses dissatisfaction with a product or service.
5. Adjustment Letter – A response to a complaint, offering solutions.
6. Sales Letter – Promotes products or services to potential customers.
7. Acknowledgment Letter – Confirms receipt of an order, inquiry, or complaint.
8. Appointment Letter – Offers a job position to a candidate.
9. Resignation Letter – Official notice of an employee leaving a job.
10. Recommendation Letter – Endorses an individual for a job or academic opportunity.

Format of a Business Letter

A standard business letter includes the following parts:

1. Sender's Address – The writer's or company's address at the top.
2. Date – The date when the letter is written.
3. Recipient's Address – The address of the person or company receiving the letter.
4. Salutation – A formal greeting (e.g., Dear Mr. Smith,).
5. Subject Line – A brief line summarizing the letter's purpose.
6. Body of the Letter – The main content, usually divided into:

- Introduction – States the purpose.
 - Main Content – Provides details.
 - Conclusion – Ends politely with a call to action.
7. Closing – A polite ending phrase (e.g., Sincerely, Best regards,).
 8. Signature – The sender’s name, designation, and contact details

11.5 Effective Business Communication

Business communication refers to the exchange of information within and outside an organization to achieve business goals. It plays a crucial role in decision-making, relationship-building, and operational efficiency.

Here are a few definitions of Effective Business Communication by different authors:

1. Murphy, Hildebrandt, and Thomas – “Effective business communication is the process of transmitting information and understanding between individuals and organizations in a manner that achieves business objectives.”
2. Peter Drucker – “The most important thing in communication is hearing what isn’t said. Effective business communication ensures that the intended message is understood and acted upon correctly.”
3. Courtland L. Bovee & John V. Thill – “Effective business communication is the exchange of messages that convey information in a clear, concise, and purposeful manner, ensuring successful business interactions.”

11.6 Importance of Effective Business Communication

Effective business communication is the foundation of a successful organisation. It ensures the smooth flow of information, enhances teamwork, and builds strong relationships with internal and external stakeholders. Clear and professional communication improves productivity, minimizes misunderstandings, and fosters a positive work environment. The following points highlight the significance of effective business communication:

1. Enhances Clarity and Understanding

Proper communication ensures that messages are conveyed clearly, reducing the chances of misinterpretation. Whether it is written, verbal, or non-verbal, effective communication eliminates confusion and promotes better understanding among employees, management, clients, and business partners.

2. Improves Employee Productivity and Collaboration

When employees receive clear instructions and expectations, they can perform their tasks efficiently. Effective communication fosters teamwork, encourages collaboration, and ensures that everyone is aligned with organizational goals. Open communication channels also allow employees to share ideas, feedback, and concerns, leading to a more engaged workforce.

3. Strengthens Business Relationships

Good communication builds trust and credibility with clients, suppliers, investors, and other stakeholders. Whether through meetings, emails, or business letters, maintaining professional communication helps establish long-term relationships, enhances customer satisfaction, and promotes brand loyalty.

4. Aids in Decision-Making

Timely and accurate information is crucial for effective decision-making. Clear communication between departments and leadership ensures that decisions are based on reliable data and insights. Properly communicated business reports, presentations, and discussions help managers and executives make informed strategic choices.

5. Reduces Conflicts and Misunderstandings

Poor communication often leads to workplace conflicts and misunderstandings. Effective communication practices, such as active listening and transparent discussions, help resolve issues quickly. Open dialogue between employees and management fosters a harmonious work environment and promotes conflict resolution.

6. Boosts Organizational Efficiency

Well-structured communication channels enhance coordination within an organization. Regular updates, meetings, and internal reports ensure that employees are well-informed about company policies, procedures, and performance expectations. This leads to streamlined operations and better efficiency in achieving business objectives.

7. Facilitates Effective Leadership

Strong leaders rely on effective communication to guide, motivate, and inspire their teams. Whether addressing employees, presenting new strategies, or negotiating business deals, good communication skills are essential for leadership success. Clear messaging helps leaders set expectations, provide feedback, and foster a positive workplace culture.

8. Supports Marketing and Customer Engagement

Marketing efforts heavily depend on effective communication. Businesses use various communication channels, such as advertising, social media, and email marketing, to reach their target audience. Persuasive and engaging communication attracts customers, conveys brand messages, and enhances customer satisfaction.

9. Enhances Crisis Management

In times of crisis, effective communication is vital for maintaining stability and reputation. Companies that communicate promptly and transparently during emergencies, such as financial downturns or public relations challenges, can minimize damage and retain stakeholder trust. Clear crisis communication ensures that employees and customers are informed and reassured.

10. Ensures Legal and Ethical Compliance

Clear and documented communication helps businesses adhere to legal and ethical standards. Written policies, contracts, and compliance guidelines prevent legal disputes and protect organizations from potential liabilities. Ethical communication also fosters a culture of honesty, accountability, and corporate responsibility.

Types of Business Communication

1. Internal Communication – Exchange of information within the organization.
 - Upward Communication – Employees to management (e.g., reports, feedback).
 - Downward Communication – Management to employees (e.g., instructions, policies).
 - Horizontal Communication – Among employees at the same level (e.g., team discussions).
2. External Communication – Communication with clients, suppliers, investors, and the public.

Methods of Business Communication

1. Verbal Communication – Face-to-face meetings, phone calls, video conferences.
2. Written Communication – Emails, business letters, reports, memos.
3. Non-Verbal Communication – Body language, gestures, facial expressions.
4. Digital Communication – Social media, instant messaging, virtual platforms.

Principles of Effective Business Communication

1. Clarity and Conciseness – Keep the message simple and to the point.
2. Correctness – Use accurate language, grammar, and facts.
3. Completeness – Provide all necessary details.
4. Courtesy – Maintain a polite and respectful tone.

5. Consideration – Understand the needs and perspectives of the audience.
6. Concreteness – Use specific facts and figures instead of vague statements.
7. Coherence – Ensure logical flow and organization of ideas.

11.7 Writing Effective Emails

Emails are a crucial form of business communication that require clarity, professionalism, and structure to ensure effectiveness.

Key Elements of an Effective Email

1. Subject Line – A concise and relevant subject line that summarizes the purpose of the email.
2. Greeting – A professional salutation addressing the recipient appropriately.
3. Opening Statement – A clear and direct introduction stating the purpose of the email.
4. Body Content – Well-structured information, divided into short paragraphs for readability.
5. Call to Action – A specific request or next steps to guide the recipient.
6. Closing Statement – A polite conclusion that expresses appreciation or provides additional details.
7. Signature – The sender's name, designation, and contact information.

Best Practices for Writing Effective Emails

- Be Clear and Concise – Use simple and direct language to convey the message.
- Maintain Professionalism – Keep the tone courteous and formal.
- Use Proper Formatting – Organize content with spacing and bullet points if necessary.
- Proofread Before Sending – Check for grammar, spelling, and punctuation errors.
- Use a Relevant Subject Line – Ensure it reflects the content of the email accurately.
- Avoid Jargon and Ambiguity – Keep the message easy to understand.
- Respond Promptly – Reply to emails in a timely manner to maintain efficiency.

11.8 Drafting a Resume

A resume is a professional document that summarizes an individual's qualifications, skills, and experiences for job applications. It should be well-structured, concise, and tailored to the specific job role.

Key Sections of a Resume

1. Header
 - Full Name
 - Contact Information (Phone Number, Email, LinkedIn Profile)

- Location (City and Country)
- 2. Professional Summary / Objective
 - A brief statement highlighting career goals and key skills.
 - Should be tailored to the job being applied for.
- 3. Work Experience
 - Job Title, Company Name, Location
 - Employment Dates (Month/Year – Month/Year)
 - Key Responsibilities and Achievements (Use bullet points for clarity)
- 4. Education
 - Degree, Major
 - Institution Name, Location
 - Year of Graduation
- 5. Skills
 - Relevant technical and soft skills related to the job.
 - Keep it precise and categorized if necessary (e.g., Software Skills, Leadership Skills).
- 6. Certifications & Training (If applicable)
 - Industry-recognized certifications or specialized training courses.
- 7. Projects & Achievements (Optional)
 - Notable projects, awards, or recognitions.
- 8. Extracurricular Activities / Volunteer Work (Optional)
 - Leadership roles, community service, or relevant non-work activities.

Best Practices for an Effective Resume

- Keep it Concise – Limit the resume to one or two pages.
- Use a Professional Format – Maintain clear headings, bullet points, and consistent fonts.
- Quantify Achievements – Use numbers and data to highlight impact (e.g., "Increased sales by 20%").
- Customize for Each Job – Align the content with the job description.
- Avoid Personal Information – Do not include age, gender, or marital status unless required.
- Proofread Carefully – Eliminate spelling and grammatical errors.

Styling and Presentations

Styling and presentation play a crucial role in delivering information effectively, whether in written documents, speeches, or visual presentations. A well-structured and visually appealing presentation enhances comprehension, engagement, and professionalism.

Key Aspects of Styling in Business Communication

1. Clarity and Simplicity
 - Use simple language and avoid unnecessary jargon.
 - Keep content structured with headings, subheadings, and bullet points.
2. Professional Formatting
 - Maintain consistency in font style, size, and color.
 - Use standard fonts like Arial, Calibri, or Times New Roman.
 - Ensure proper alignment, spacing, and margins for readability.
3. Visual Appeal
 - Use graphs, charts, and images to support key points.
 - Maintain a balance between text and visuals.
 - Avoid clutter and excessive use of colors or animations.
4. Tone and Language
 - Adapt tone based on the audience (formal, persuasive, or informative).
 - Use active voice for clarity and directness.
 - Keep sentences concise and impactful.

Effective Presentation Techniques

1. Planning and Structuring
 - Start with a clear introduction, followed by the main content, and conclude with key takeaways.
 - Use a logical flow to maintain coherence.
2. Engaging Delivery
 - Maintain eye contact and use confident body language.
 - Speak clearly, with appropriate pauses and emphasis.
 - Encourage audience interaction when applicable.
3. Use of Visual Aids
 - Slides should be visually appealing but not overloaded with text.
 - Key points should be highlighted for easy retention.

- Ensure readability with contrasting colors and legible fonts.
4. Time Management
 - Keep the presentation within the allocated time.
 - Prioritize key messages to avoid unnecessary details.
 5. Practice and Rehearsal
 - Rehearse multiple times to ensure fluency and confidence.
 - Anticipate possible questions and prepare responses.

11.9 Learning Outcomes

After studying this unit, learners will be able to understand the purpose and importance of meetings and conferences in business organizations. They will gain the ability to plan, conduct, and participate effectively in different types of meetings. Learners will be able to understand meeting procedures, agenda preparation, and minute writing. The unit will also enable learners to develop confidence and professionalism while communicating in formal meeting environments.

11.10 Model Examination Questions

Multiple Choice Questions (MCQs)

1. Which of the following is the primary objective of effective business communication?
 - a) To increase personal conversations
 - b) To ensure clarity and professionalism in messages
 - c) To use complex language for impressing others
 - d) To reduce communication in the workplace
2. What is the key benefit of written business communication?
 - a) It provides a formal record of information
 - b) It is always more engaging than verbal communication
 - c) It eliminates the need for face-to-face interactions
 - d) It allows for faster response time than verbal communication
3. Which of the following is NOT a type of business communication?
 - a) Upward communication
 - b) Horizontal communication
 - c) Diagonal communication
 - d) Casual communication
4. Effective communication in a business setting helps in:
 - a) Increasing misunderstandings
 - b) Strengthening relationships with stakeholders

- c) Avoiding teamwork and collaboration
 - d) Ignoring feedback from employees
5. Which principle of business communication focuses on keeping the message free from grammatical and factual errors?
 - a) Courtesy b) Correctness c) Consideration d) Concreteness
 6. Which form of communication is most appropriate for immediate feedback?
 - a) Written communication b) Verbal communication
 - c) Digital communication d) Non-verbal communication
 7. What should a business email subject line be like?
 - a) Short, clear, and relevant b) Detailed and lengthy
 - c) Informal and friendly d) Left blank for flexibility
 8. Which type of business correspondence is used to formally request information about products or services?
 - a) Complaint letter b) Inquiry letter c) Sales letter d) Adjustment letter
 9. Which of the following is a key characteristic of effective business communication?
 - a) Ambiguity b) Clarity c) Complexity d) Jargon-heavy language
 10. What is the most appropriate closing phrase for a formal business letter?
 - a) See you soon! b) Best wishes c) Yours sincerely d) Take care

Answers:

- | | |
|---|---|
| 1. b) To ensure clarity and professionalism in messages | 2. a) It provides a formal record of information |
| 3. d) Casual communication | 4. b) Strengthening relationships with stakeholders |
| 5. b) Correctness | 6. b) Verbal communication |
| 7. a) Short, clear, and relevant | 8. b) Inquiry letter |
| 9. b) Clarity | 10. c) Yours sincerely |

Short Answer Type Questions

1. Explain two key benefits of effective business communication in an organization.
2. What are the essential elements of a professional business email?
3. Why is clarity important in business correspondence? Provide an example.
4. What are the essential components of a business letter?

Long Answer Type Questions

1. Describe the importance of business correspondence and its role in organisational success.
2. Discuss the key principles of effective business communication and how they contribute to workplace efficiency.
3. Explain the components of a well-structured business presentation and the techniques used to engage an audience.

Unit 12-Oral Communication

Structure

- 12.0 Introduction
- 12.1 Objectives
- 12.2 Oral communication
- 12.3 Challenges of Oral Communication
- 12.4 Definition of Public Meetings
- 12.5 Types of Public Meetings
- 12.6 Extempore Speeches
- 12.7 Introduction to Mass Communication
- 12.8 Learning Outcomes
- 12.9 Model Examination Questions

12.0 Introduction

Effective communication plays a vital role in both personal and professional life. Among various forms of communication, oral communication stands out as a fundamental means of expressing thoughts, ideas, and emotions through spoken words. Whether in formal settings like business meetings, public gatherings, and academic discussions, or informal conversations, oral communication helps in building relationships and facilitating smooth interactions.

Public meetings are those where individuals gather to discuss issues of public concern. These meetings provide a platform for decision-making, community participation, and transparency in governance. Understanding their structure, significance, and challenges can enhance one's ability to contribute effectively in public forums.

Similarly, extempore speaking is an essential skill that requires individuals to deliver spontaneous speeches without prior preparation. It helps in developing quick thinking, confidence, and the ability to articulate ideas clearly. Extempore speaking is widely used in academic, corporate, and leadership scenarios, making it a valuable skill for personal and professional growth.

This unit will explore the key concepts of oral communication, public meetings, and extempore speeches, highlighting their characteristics, importance, challenges, and strategies for improvement. By the end of this unit, learners will have a deeper understanding of these communication methods and become better equipped to communicate effectively in various settings.

12.1 Learning Objectives

After studying this material, learners will be able to:

- Explain the meaning, characteristics, and types of oral communication and its role in effective interactions.
- Explain the functions, types, and impact of mass communication in modern society.
- Apply techniques to improve clarity, confidence, and spontaneity in oral and extempore communication.
- Identify common barriers in oral and mass communication and explore solutions to overcome them

12.2 Oral communication

Oral communication is the act of conveying information or ideas by means of spoken words. It is one of the most prevalent and efficient methods of communication employed in both personal and professional life. Oral communication may occur in a number of different ways. They are face-to-face discussions, telephone conversations, speeches, presentations, discussions, and meetings.

Characteristics of Oral Communication

- Verbal Expression – It utilizes the spoken words to communicate. Tone, pitch, and voice clarity are significant factors in making the message effective.
- Immediate Feedback – Oral communication, unlike written communication, has immediate responses, which makes it more interactive and interesting.
- Non-Verbal Cues – It uses body language, facial expressions, gestures, and eye contact, which aid in strengthening the message.
- Flexible and Spontaneous – It enables instant changes, clarifications, and expansions depending on the reactions and feedback of the listener.
- Informal and Formal Modes – Oral communication can be informal, such as everyday conversations, or formal, such as business meetings or speeches before the public.

Types of Oral Communication

- Interpersonal Communication – Person-to-person conversations between two people, such as friends, co-workers, or relatives.
- Group Communication – Discussions or interactions between a group of individuals, for example, meetings, panel discussions, or team working.

- Public Speaking – A speech or presentation made to a sizable audience it can be a formal environment such as conferences or seminars.
- Telephonic and Virtual Communication – Phone calls or communication over digital platforms like video calls, which allow people to communicate regardless of geographical distances.

Importance of Oral Communication

- Improves Relationships – Proper oral communication promotes healthier personal and working relationships through the facilitation of understanding.
- Improves Confidence and Convincing Power – Strong speaking skills enable individuals to speak effectively and convincingly, something crucial in leadership, sales, and negotiation.
- Saves Time – Oral communication tends to be faster than written communication, thus serving to speed up discussions and decision-making.
- Fosters Teamwork – It is an essential element of teamwork, where effective and clear communication assists in the attainment of shared objectives.
- Facilitates Learning and Teaching – Oral communication is an integral element of learning, where teachers communicate concepts through it and learners discuss to improve comprehension.

12.3 Challenges of Oral Communication

- Misinterpretation – When words spoken by the speaker are not understandable or when the listener is preoccupied, misconceptions result.
- Lack of Record – As opposed to written communication, oral words are not recorded unless they are recorded, and it becomes hard to look back at them.
- Influence of Emotions – The mood of the speaker, for instance, nervousness or excitement, can influence the message's clarity and effectiveness.
- Language Barriers – Accent, vocabulary, and language differences might interfere with communication.

Ways to Improve Oral Communication Skills

- Practice Active Listening – Listening is the act of receiving sounds and interpreting the meaning. while listening give full attention to the speaker, ask proper questions, and give suitable responses.
- Develop Clarity and Confidence – Speak clearly, at an even pace, and confidently to make the message clear.

- Use Effective Non-Verbal Cues – Keep eye contact, use proper gestures, and adopt positive body language to improve communication.
- Build Vocabulary and Language Proficiency – Enhance vocabulary and pronunciation to articulate ideas more effectively and accurately.
- Seek Feedback and Enhance – Seek feedback from others and address areas of weakness

12.4 Definition of Public Meetings

A public meeting is a meeting of people, government agencies, organizations, or community associations organize them, for the purposes of discussing and responding to specified matters, concerns, or policy issues that impact the public. Public meetings are typically open to all community members, and citizens get the opportunity to attend, offer opinions, and comment on matters of public interest.

Characteristics of Public Meetings

1. Open to the Public – Anyone who is interested may attend and take part.
2. Organized by Authorities or Organizations – Hosted by government agencies, community leaders, or organizations.
3. Specific Agenda – The meeting has a formal agenda centering on specific issues, e.g., policy matters, social concerns, or project advancements.
4. Opportunity for Public Participation – Citizens may ask questions, give feedback, and express their views.
5. Recorded Proceedings – Official records or minutes are usually kept in order to maintain transparency and accountability.

12.5 Types of Public Meetings

1. Government Public Meetings – Conducted by national, state, or local government entities for discussion on laws, development projects, and policies.
2. Community Meetings – Convened by social groups or neighbourhood associations for resolving issues within a neighbourhood.
3. Town Hall Meetings – Public meetings that provide open forums for interaction between officials and the public, to listen to people's views and provide clarification on issues.
4. Public Hearings – Official gatherings where stakeholders give feedback on policy decisions prior to implementation.

5. Press Conferences – Gatherings where officials or organizations make important announcements to the media and the public.
6. Importance of Public Meetings
7. Facilitate Transparency – They guarantee that discussions are made in an open manner and that the public is kept informed.
8. Enhance Citizen Participation – Offer a platform for individuals to express their concerns and be part of decision-making.
9. Strengthen Democracy – Provide for open dialogue and accountability of policymakers and leaders.
10. Enable Better Decision-Making – Public feedback enables authorities to make informed decisions.

12.6 Extempore Speeches

Extempore speech is an impromptu or spontaneous speech given without any preparation. In contrast to prepared speeches, in which a speaker prepares and practices what they have to say, extempore speaking calls for thinking fast, proper articulation, and confidence to communicate ideas well on the spur of the moment. Extempore speeches are traditionally employed in academic institutions, business organizations, debates, interviews, and speech competitions.

Features of Extempore Speeches

- No Advance Preparation – The speaker is assigned a subject at the spur of the moment and has to develop ideas quickly.
- Spontaneous Delivery – In contrast to prepared speeches, extempore speeches depend upon the capacity of the speaker to think and talk at the same time.
- Concise and to the Point – As the speech is impromptu, the speaker generally keeps it concise and to the point.
- Logical Flow – Regardless of lack of preparation, the speech must exhibit a logical sequence—introduction, key points, and conclusion.
- Confidence and Presence – Good presence, voice modulation, and clear speech make an extempore speech more effective.

Importance of Extempore Speaking

- Improves Public Speaking Skills – Facilitates the development of confidence in speaking in front of people.

- Improves Quick Thinking – Conditions the mind to think critically and structure thoughts quickly.
- Improves Communication Skills – Enhances verbal expression and articulation skills.
- Prepares for Real-Life Situations – In leadership, interviews, and conferences, extempore skills facilitate the effective management of unexpected events.
- Fosters Creativity – As there is no script, speakers must be creative thinkers and express different viewpoints.

12.7 Introduction to Mass Communication

Mass communication is the process of broadcasting information, ideas, messages, or entertainment to a wide audience through different mediums of media. It is vital to molding public opinion, spreading information, and shaping trends in society. Mass communication is applied in journalism, advertising, public relations, entertainment, and web media systems to reach millions of individuals around the globe.

The main objective of mass communication is to inform, educate, entertain, or persuade a large audience through such technologies as newspapers, television, radio, social media, and the internet. It is an effective instrument that brings people and communities together despite geographical and cultural distances.

Features of Mass Communication

1. Large Audience Reach – Mass communication aims at a large and dispersed audience instead of one individual or a small group of audience.
2. Use of Mass Media – It depends upon different media channels like television, newspapers, radio, and the internet to communicate messages.
3. One-Way or Limited Feedback – In contrast to interpersonal communication, feedback in mass communication is usually delayed or indirect, as by way of audience ratings, comments, or surveys.
4. Influence on Public Opinion – Mass communication can influence people's thinking, beliefs, and cultural trends.
5. Professionally Produced Content – The messages are typically produced by journalists, advertisers, broadcasters, or content creators with professional expertise.
6. Fast and Wide Dissemination – Information can be disseminated rapidly throughout various regions, which makes mass communication necessary for news and emergency broadcasts.

Types of Mass Communication

Mass communication can be categorized into a number of types based on the medium employed to send messages:

1. Print Media: Newspapers, magazines, books, pamphlets, and posters are part of print media. It is one of the earliest types of mass communication, offering in-depth information and analysis.

Example: Newspapers such as The New York Times, The Guardian, or The Times of India.

2. Broadcast Media: Radio and television, which deliver audio and visual information to a mass audience are called as broadcast media. It is used for news, entertainment, advertising, and educational content.

Example: BBC News, CNN, National Geographic, FM radio.

3. Digital and Social Media: It comprises of websites, blogs, social media sites (Facebook, Twitter, Instagram, YouTube), and online news. It is the quickest developing type of mass communication, with interactive and real-time exchange.

Example: Online news, YouTube and online advertisements.

4. Entertainment and Cinema Media: Comprises movies, documentaries, and online streaming services like Netflix and Amazon Prime. They shape popular culture, narratives, and social messages.

Example: Hollywood, Bollywood, Netflix originals.

5. Public Relations (PR) and Advertising: PR handles a company's public image, whereas advertising sells products or services to consumers.

Functions of Mass Communication

Mass communication performs several functions in society, such as:

1. Information and News Dissemination: Delivers the latest news on world events, politics, business, and social issues.

Example: Breaking news on television, news websites, radio broadcasts.

2. Education and Awareness: Diffuses information on health, science, technology, and cultural issues with an objective of creating awareness in the public.

Example: Health education programs on television, computer courses, social awareness campaigns.

3. Entertainment: Movies, music, television programs, sports coverage, and video games for leisure and amusement provide entertainment value

Example: Netflix TV series, reality television programs, live concerts.

4. Persuasion and Influence: Advertising, political campaigns are used to influence and shape the behaviour of people.

Example: Political orations, social activism on social media, endorsement by celebrities.

5. Social Integration: It allows individuals in remaining engaged with international affairs and cultural movements.

Example: Social media networks linking people from different nations.

6. Cultural Transmission: It encourages the exchange of cultures and the conservation of traditions by means of documentaries, movies, and music.

Example: Classic films, promotion of folk music, art galleries.

Significance of Mass Communication

1. Encourages Democracy and Free Speech: In democratic nations, mass communication enables individuals to give opinions, engage in debates, and remain informed about government policy.

Example: Debates on news, investigative reporting, freedom of the press.

2. Enhances Business and Economy: Advertising and PR campaigns drive to change consumer behaviour and promotes economic growth.

Example: E-commerce ads, marketing campaigns on TV and social media.

3. Bridges Geographical Gaps: Connects people from different parts of the world, making global communication instant and effective.

Example: Live-streamed international events, global business conferences.

4. Supports Crisis Communication: Provides real-time updates on natural disasters, health crises, and emergency alerts.

Example: COVID-19 awareness campaigns, weather warnings.

5. Encourages Social Change: Mass communication is also significant in the advancement of gender equality, environmental education, and human rights.

Examples: Anti-racism campaigns, climate change films.

Mass Communication Challenges

1. Disinformation and False News: With the advent of digital media, there has been the dissemination of false information, propaganda, and disinformation.

Solution: Fact-checking portals, ethical journalism.

2. Media Bias and Manipulation: Certain media will report biased news based on political or corporate pressure.

Solution: Promoting media literacy and multiple news sources.

3. Privacy Issues: Social media sites and online advertising gather user information, resulting in privacy problems.

Solution: Tougher data protection regulations, cybersecurity practices.

4. Digital Divide: Not all people have equal access to digital mass communication tools, resulting in a divide between city and rural dwellers.

Solution: Increasing internet access and digital education initiatives.

5. Information Overload: With huge volumes of media content around, audiences can have difficulty sorting out meaningful and factual information.

Solution: Media literacy programs, critical thinking.

Future Trends in Mass Communication

1. Artificial Intelligence in Journalism: Automated news reporting and content curation are being done by AI-powered tools.

Example: Chatbot journalism, AI-generated news summaries.

2. Virtual and Augmented Reality (VR/AR) in Media: Immersive media experiences and interactive storytelling are gaining traction.

Example: VR movies, 360-degree news reports.

3. Personalized Content via Big Data: Media platforms leverage data analytics to personalize content according to user tastes.

Example: Netflix suggestions, targeted ads.

4. Emergence of Citizen Journalism: Social media enables everyday citizens to contribute news and provide real-time updates.

Example: Twitter breaking news hashtags, lone YouTube journalism.

5. Expansion of Podcasts and Digital Radio: Audio-centric media is emerging as a substitute for the conventional broadcast media.

Example: Spotify podcasts, online talk shows.

12.8 Learning Outcomes

After completing this unit, learners will be able to understand the role of digital communication in modern business environments. They will gain knowledge of various digital communication tools such as emails, social media, video conferencing, and online platforms. Learners will be able to apply netiquette and ethical practices in digital communication. The unit will also enable learners to evaluate the impact of technology on business communication and adapt effectively to emerging communication trends.

12.9 Model Examination Questions

Multiple-Choice Questions (MCQs)

1. Which of the following is a key characteristic of oral communication?
 - a) Delayed feedback
 - b) Immediate feedback
 - c) Only written form is allowed
 - d) No use of body language
2. What is an example of public communication?
 - a) A casual conversation between two friends
 - b) A business email to a colleague
 - c) A politician's speech at a rally
 - d) A private phone call
3. Which of the following is a major disadvantage of oral communication?
 - a) It is slow and inefficient
 - b) It does not allow for flexibility
 - c) It lacks a permanent record
 - d) It is always formal
4. Which type of communication includes gestures, facial expressions, and body movements?
 - a) Verbal communication
 - b) Written communication
 - c) Non-verbal communication
 - d) Digital communication
5. What is a characteristic of public meetings?
 - a) Restricted to private individuals only
 - b) Open to the public for discussion
 - c) No agenda is required
 - d) No official records are maintained
6. Which of the following is NOT a type of oral communication?
 - a) Speech
 - b) Meeting
 - c) Email
 - d) Discussion
7. What is the main purpose of an extempore speech?
 - a) To read from a script
 - b) To deliver a well-rehearsed presentation
 - c) To speak spontaneously without prior preparation

- # Answers

- ### Short Answer Type Questions

- 182

Long Answer Type Questions

1. Explain the characteristics and importance of oral communication in professional settings.
2. What is an extempore speech? Describe its challenges and techniques to improve this skill.
3. Discuss mass communication and its various types. How does it impact society?

Keywords

- A committee report: A document prepared by a group of individuals (committee) analysing a particular issue, making recommendations, or presenting findings.
- Active Listening: A communication technique in which the listener fully concentrates on the speaker, understands the message, and responds appropriately through clarification or summarization.
- Appraisal Interview: An appraisal interview is held to review and discuss an employee's performance, strengths, achievements, and areas requiring improvement.
- Audience Analysis: The process of identifying the audience and adapting a speech according to their interests, level of understanding, attitudes, and beliefs.
- Business communication: The exchange of information within and outside an organization to achieve business goals.
- Business Management: The process of planning, organizing, directing, and controlling organizational resources to achieve business objectives efficiently and effectively.
- Call to Action: A statement or message intended to motivate the audience to take a specific action after a speech, presentation, or written communication.
- Clarity: The use of simple, concise, and unambiguous language to ensure the message is easily understood by the receiver. Clear communication reduces misunderstandings and enhances efficiency.
- Commemorative Speech: A speech delivered to celebrate, honor, or remember a person, event, or idea, with emphasis on shared values and creating an emotional connection with the audience.
- Communication: A act or process of conveying a message which must generate a response.
- Concession: A deliberate adjustment or modification of one's demands or terms made to move closer to an agreement.
- Conciseness: The quality of expressing ideas briefly, clearly, and directly without unnecessary words.
- Conflict Management: Handling disagreements and differences of opinion in a constructive, respectful, and solution-oriented manner.

- Corporate Recruitment: The process of hiring candidates for organizations, where group discussions are often used as a tool for evaluation and selection.
- Credibility: The quality of being trusted and believed in by the audience.
- Crisis Communication: Managing and delivering clear, accurate, and timely messages during high-pressure or emergency situations.
- Crisis Management: Handling emergencies and unexpected challenges effectively to minimize negative impact on individuals and organizations.
- Decision-Making: The process of selecting the most appropriate solution from available alternatives during group discussions or organizational interactions.
- Demographics: The statistical characteristics of a population, such as age, gender, income, and education, used to understand and analyze audience composition.
- Effective Interviewing: Conducting interviews in a manner that achieves the intended purpose through proper preparation, clear questioning, active listening, and building rapport.
- Elevator Pitch: A brief and persuasive speech that clearly outlines an idea for a product, service, or project within a short time.
- Emotional Intelligence: The ability to recognize, understand, regulate, and effectively use one's own emotions as well as the emotions of others to maintain rapport and make thoughtful, non-reactive decisions during negotiation.
- Empathy: The ability to understand, relate to, and share the feelings and perspectives of others.
- Ethics: Moral standards such as honesty, fairness, and transparency that guide behavior and decision-making during negotiations.
- Ethos: Persuasion based on the credibility, character, or authority of the speaker.
- Exit Interview: An exit interview is conducted with an employee who is leaving the organization to understand the reasons for departure and to gather feedback for organizational improvement.
- Feedback: Information that indicates the extent or degree to which extent the communicator has been able to achieve the communication objective.
- Feedback: The response or reaction of the receiver to a message. It helps the sender understand whether the message was correctly interpreted and allows for necessary adjustments to improve communication.

- Filler Words: Unnecessary sounds or expressions such as “um” and “uh” that are used to fill pauses in speech without adding meaningful content.
- Formal Communication: Structured and professional communication that follows official channels within an organization, such as reports, emails, and business meetings. It ensures accountability and maintains professionalism.
- Group Discussion (GD): A structured conversation in which individuals exchange ideas, opinions, and viewpoints on a given topic.
- Group Dynamics: The patterns of interaction, relationships, and behaviours among members of a group that influence group performance.
- Impromptu Speaking: Speaking or engaging in conversation without prior preparation or advance notice.
- Interview: A structured or unstructured conversation in which one person asks questions to another in order to gather information or assess suitability, such as for a job, appraisal, or research purpose.
- Investor Deck: A presentation prepared by entrepreneurs to persuade potential investors to provide funding for a business idea or startup.
- Logos: Persuasion based on logic, reasoning, facts, and evidence.
- Manuscript: A fully written speech that is read word for word and is commonly used in formal, official, or technical communication.
- Mass Communication: The process of disseminating information, ideas, or messages to a large audience through various media channels such as television, radio, newspapers, and social media.
- Negotiation: A purposeful communication process in which two or more parties interact to reach a mutually acceptable agreement.
- Non-Verbal Communication: Conveying messages without words by using body language, facial expressions, gestures, and other behavioural cues.
- Oral Communication: The process of exchanging information through spoken words. It includes face-to-face conversations, speeches, discussions, and presentations.
- Paralanguage: The non-verbal elements of speech such as tone, pitch, pace, volume, and pauses that influence the meaning of spoken messages.
- Pathos: A form of persuasion that appeals to the emotions and feelings of the audience.

- Posture: The position in which a person stands, sits, or holds the body, and it plays an important role in effective non-verbal communication.
- Preparedness: Proactive planning and actions taken in advance to anticipate and respond effectively to potential crises.
- Problem Solving: The process of identifying issues, analysing causes, and collaboratively finding effective solutions.
- Proxemics: The study of how physical distance and personal space affect communication and interpersonal interactions.
- Public Meetings: Formal gatherings where individuals, organizations, or government bodies discuss important issues or policies affecting the public.
- Question Types: Different forms of questions used in interviews, such as open-ended, closed-ended, probing, and leading questions, each serving specific purposes in information gathering.
- Rapport Building: The process of developing trust and mutual understanding with the interviewee to make them feel comfortable and open during the interview.
- Report writing: The process of preparing structured documents that present facts, findings, analysis, and recommendations.
- Research Interview: A research interview is used to collect qualitative or quantitative data from participants on a specific topic for academic or organizational research purposes.
- Risk Analysis: The process of identifying and evaluating potential problems or uncertainties that could adversely affect business initiatives, decisions, or projects.
- Selection Interview: A selection interview is conducted to evaluate and select suitable candidates for a specific job position within an organization.
- Stakeholder: A person or group that has an interest in an organization, project, or business activity and may be affected by its outcomes.
- Storytelling: The use of narratives or real-life examples to create a connection with the audience rather than relying only on facts and data.
- Structured Interview: A structured interview is one in which a predefined set of questions is asked in a fixed order to all interviewees, ensuring consistency and comparability of responses.

- Takeaway: The key point or main idea that the audience is expected to remember from a meeting or presentation.
- Typology: A method of classifying or categorizing items based on shared characteristics; in interviews, it denotes different types or categories of interviews.
- Unstructured Interview: An unstructured interview is conducted without a fixed set of questions, allowing the discussion to flow naturally based on the interviewer's judgment and the interviewee's responses.
- Verbal Communication: The exchange of information using spoken words.
- Vocal Tics: Involuntary and repetitive sounds or actions during speech, such as frequently clearing the throat, which may distract listeners.
- Written communication: Transmitting messages through written formats.

Suggested Books for Further Readings

1. Aruna "Business Communication" TNH-2001
2. Penrose, Rasberry and Myers, "Business Communication for Managers", Cengage Learning.
3. Ken Robert W. A short guide to successful writing in management HBS, 1986.
4. Matthukutty M M, Business "Communication Strategies TMH "2001.
5. Kathleen Fearn-Banks, "Crisis Communications, A Casebook Approach", Routledge
6. The Quick and Easy Way to Effective Speaking, Dale Carnegie, Fingerprint! Publishing.
7. Talk Like TED, Carmine Gallo.
8. Speak with confidence, Mike Acker, John Wiley and Sons Inc.

Subject: MMBA222CCT - Business Communication

Maulana Azad National Urdu University

Programme: M.B.A

Paper: MMBA222CCT, Paper Title: Business Communication

Time: 3 Hours

Total Marks: 70

Note: This question paper consists of three parts: Part-A, Part-B, Part-C. Number of words to answer each question is only indicative. Attempt all parts.

Part-A: contains 10 compulsory questions of multiple choice / fill in the blank / very short answer type question. Answer all questions. Each question carries 1 mark. (10x1= 10 marks)

Part-B: contains 08 questions of which students are supposed to answer 05 questions. Answer each question in approximately 200 words. Each question carries 06 marks. (05x6= 30 marks)

Part-C: contains 05 questions of which students are supposed to answer 03 questions. Answer each question in approximately 500 words. Each question carries 10 marks. (03x10= 30 marks)

PART A

1. Which of the following statements accurately describes the role of noise in the communication process within organizations?

- A. Noise refers to the physical disturbances that disrupt the transmission of messages in communication.
- B. Noise is a psychological barrier that hinders the decoding of messages by receivers.
- C. Noise represents the semantic errors or misunderstandings that occur during the encoding of messages by senders.
- D. Noise encompasses all the external and internal factors that create interference and hinder effective communication.

2. Which type of communication occurs between individuals at the same hierarchical level in an organization?

- a) Downward communication, b) Upward communication, c) Lateral communication
- d) Diagonal communication

3. A communication network that allows all members to communicate directly with each other is called:

- a) Chain network
- b) Wheel network,
- c) Circle network
- d) All-channel network

4. Which of the following is an example of a psychological barrier to communication?

- a) Noise, b) Language differences, c) Cultural differences, d) Prejudice

5. What is the term for the type of communication that involves the exchange of information, ideas, and proposals between parties with conflicting interests to achieve mutually beneficial outcomes?

6. What is the purpose of feedback in the communication process?

- a) To transmit information,
- b) To confirm understanding
- c) To overcome barriers,
- d) To establish authority

7. What is the term for the active and focused process of receiving, interpreting, and understanding verbal and nonverbal messages in the communication process?

8. Negotiation is a process of:

- a) Persuading others to accept your point of view
- b) Forcing others to comply with your demands
- c) Collaboratively reaching an agreement
- d) Avoiding conflict entirely

9. Which of the following is a common purpose of conducting a business meeting?

- a) Making important announcements
- b) Solving conflicts
- c) Conducting training sessions
- d) All of the above

10. What is the term for the systematic arrangement of communication channels and relationships within an organization to facilitate the flow of information, decisions, and coordination?

PART B

1. Analyze the different types of communication, and evaluate their significance in the context of managerial communication strategies.

2. Examine the concept of communication networks within organizations, comparing and contrasting formal and informal communication networks and their impact on organizational effectiveness.

3. Identify the major barriers to effective communication in the workplace, and propose strategies and techniques that managers can employ to overcome these barriers.

4. Outline the essential factors required for effective communication in a diverse and global business environment, considering cultural differences, language barriers, and technological advancements.

5. Explore the importance of active listening in effective communication, highlighting key listening skills that managers can employ to improve their listening abilities in various organizational contexts.

- 6. Discuss the significance of feedback in the communication process, examining its role in promoting dialogue, and improving overall communication effectiveness within organizations.
- 7. Examine the essential elements and techniques for delivering impactful business presentations, including effective storytelling, visual aids, and audience engagement strategies.
- 8. Evaluate the principles and tactics of negotiation in business contexts, analysing the role of effective communication in achieving mutually beneficial outcomes.

Section C

- 1. Provide a comprehensive guide to crafting an impressive resume, covering essential sections, formatting tips, and effective language usage to showcase professional achievements and skills effectively.
- 2. Analyse various interview formats, communication techniques, and strategies for effectively presenting qualifications and responding to interview questions.
- 3. Discuss the importance of effective communication in group discussions, analyzing strategies for facilitating productive and collaborative discussions in business settings.
- 4. Develop a professional resume highlighting your achievements, skills, and qualifications, while effectively communicating your personal brand and value proposition to potential employers.
- 5. Create a comprehensive meeting agenda for a strategic planning session, outlining discussion topics, objectives, and time allocations, while ensuring effective communication and active participation from all attendees.

Notes/اہم نکات